It was God's first thought to make man in his own image, it is also his last thought, but with a deeper developement of glory unspeakable. He would make man not to be a mere picture of himself, but like him as being partaker of his very nature. The apostle Peter says: "He hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises; that through these ye may become partakers of the Divine Nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust." And Paul, writing to the Colossians, speaks of "the dispensation of God which was given unto youward, to fulfil the Word of God, even the mystery which hath been hid from all ages and generations; but now hath it been manifested to his saints, to whom God was pleased to make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ in you the hope of glory."

And to this wondrous possibility we are begotten by the word of God! Therefore "be ye and not hearers only." As the Lord himself fulfilled the Scriptures in his own Person, we are called as his followers to fulfil the Scriptures also. He would have nothing unaccomplished which was written about him, and if we have the mind of Christ, we shall search the Scriptures diligently to discover and to accomplish all which we shall find written about us; we shall not fear to put God's promises to the proof; we shall not fear to obey him, whatsoever that obedience may cost us. For if anyone is a hearer of the Word and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a mirror. God's word is a mirror in which we are reflected and he is reflected. We must know him in the Scriptures that we may know ourselves, and we must know ourselves in the Scriptures that we may know him. But neither the one nor the other theoretically, for the man who is a hearer and not a doer is "like unto a man beholding his natural face in a mirror, for he beholdeth himself, and goeth away, and straightway forgets what manner of man he was."

Doers of the Word

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"TO VISIT THE FATHERLESS AND THE WIDOW."

SIX distinct lessons are taught in the twelve verses selected for the subject of the day. James was evidently a student and admirer of the Hebrew Wisdom literature, of which the Proverbs is the only specimen in our Bibles, though two other books of the same style are in the Apocrypha. He touches on an important subject, lets fall a weighty utterance or two, and proceeds to another subject, without stating the connection or association of ideas which existed in his own mind. Here, we have first the fact of human responsibility. No man is to hold God responsible for his weak and sinful condition. God is the giver of good gifts, and he is not variable. Then, he had a distinct purpose in the development of his people; they were to be the first fruits or specimen of what the whole creation would eventually become. Therefore they should be such people as James proceeds to describe. They should be teachable, swift to hear. They should not be vain talkers. Should not easily get angry. Should be receptive. Above all, they should be doers of the word. James has no respect for the idle man who is content with hearing and believing, and does no good. Finally, active benevolence and purity of mind and heart, he says, constitute pure religion. Probably he does not mean religion, as we understand the word, but rather worship, having in his mind the Pharisaic notion that fasting, paying tithes and praying regularly were undoubted proofs of religion being in the soul. James thinks that kindness, love, charity and purity are the true proofs. His ideal Christian will in those ways prove himself to be a son of God. Throughout his epistle he insists on this view that a man who is not doing good, has reason for doubting whether he is good, no matter how learned, or orthodox, or wealthy he may be.

Scholars differ in opinion as to the personality of the writer of the epistle. After much investigation and argument, the majority now believe that he was not James the Apostle, who was with Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration and in the Garden, but James the Just, one of the brothers of the Lord, who was an unbeliever until after the resurrection, when, like Paul, he was converted by a personal revelation. (See 1 Cor. 15: 7.) He became pastor of the Church in Jerusalem. Farrar, writing of him, says that he was a rigid observer of the Jewish ritual, and the Jews looked to him with reverence, knowing that the blood of David flowed in his veins. He was a regular worshipper in the Temple and his knees had grown hard with kneeling in prayer for his people. He was clad only in white linen, and the long locks of his Nazarite vow falling over his shoulders gave him a majestic appearance. He was an ascetic of stern sanctity of life, and if any one could have won the Jews to Christianity, it would have been he. Two traditions exist about his death, which took place about A. D. 62. One is that he was stoned; the other that he was flung from a gable of the Temple, and while prostrate but still living, was brained with a fuller's club. His epistle is believed to have been written about the year 59 to the believing Jews, who voluntarily or through persecution, had left their own land.

The Father of lights. In a lonely country district one rainy, windy night a family gathered around an open fire enjoying the warmth and light and comfort all the more because of the contrast with the discomfort out of doors. Late at night there was a knock at the door. Some of the family hesitated about opening it. It might be a robber or a tramp or some other unwelcome visitor. The knocking continued, and at last the master of the house cautiously opened the door a few inches. A miserable, rain-soaked, mud-bespattered boy stood there holding up a lantern, saying, "Please give a poor boy a light." Not much was given away in that house, but a light would cost nothing, and the candle in the boy's lantern was lighted and he went his way cheerfully and safely. Every one may in another sense "give a poor boy a light," to help him along his path in the world. A kind word, a gentle warning, an encouraging smile, or touch, may do it. One soul is lighted from another and the great original source of this light is the Father of Lights.

Be swift to hear. Prompt and implicit obedience to the revealed, will of God as soon as it is known and realized is a sign of a converted person. Too many argue about it and twist and turn it to see if it cannot be made to read as they would like. A great captain after a battle was talking over the events of the day with his officers, and he asked them who had done the best that day. Some spoke of one man who had fought bravely, and some another. "No," he said, "you are all mistaken. The best man in the field to-day was a soldier who was just lifting up his arm to strike an enemy, but when he heard the trumpet sound a retreat, checked himself and dropped his arm without striking the blow. That perfect and ready obedience to the will of the general is the noblest thing that can be done."

The implanted word. The only security for right conduct is the life that Christ gives implanted in the soul. "I once asked a French pastor," says Mackey, "how they got on with their Roman Catholic neighbors? He said: 'We have Roman Catholic priests who come to us and say, "We should like to enter your religion." I always reply to them: "That is not the thing at all, dear brother; the thing is for our religion to enter you."'"

The perfect law of liberty. The law of Christ is a law of love, but under it people do spontaneously more than they would do under a law of force. No law would ensure missionaries going abroad to preach the Gospel at the risk of their lives, of others going into filthy slums incurring danger of contracting loathsome diseases. They do it not of law but because they love to serve Christ and are under the law of liberty. And they accomplish more, for love begets love and obedience and sorrow for sin. Jeannie Hugo, the granddaughter, and the pet of the poet, having manifested a strong objection to learning the alphabet her mother, thinking to sharpen her energies, told her one day that until she had learned the first twelve letters she should have no dessert. The first thing the child did was to pour out her troubles to her grandpa, who was as usual, ready to listen, but on this occasion powerless to interfere. However, to lighten the privations of his little darling, he proposed to her that they should suffer together; he would touch no dessert as long as she had to abstain. And he kept his word.

Not a hearer that forgetteth, but a doer that worketh. (R. V.), a poor woman, who kept a small country store, went to hear a famous preacher. It was a great event for her, and she was loud in praise of the sermon. She was asked what the preacher had said, what the text was, and other questions, but was unable to answer. "You do not appear to remember much about it," said one. "Ah," said the woman, "I remembered something. I had two bushel measures, one to buy with and one to sell with. The first was a little too large and the other a little too small. I remembered enough of the sermon to burn them both and get one measure of the right size."

LITTLE WAIFS OF JERUSALEM.

Tenderly Cared for, Nourished and Nursed at the "Marienstift," or Children's Hospital —Twenty Years of Benevolent Work.

JUST about fifteen minutes' easy walk from the Damascus Gate of Jerusalem, in a northwesterly direction, on a ridge that almost overlooks the walls of the city, is the German Hospital for Children, which bears the appropriate name, "Marienstift," (Mary's Foundation.) This plain, unpretentious house, which seems quite humble by contrast with the imposing Russian buildings on the crest of the same ridge, has a most interesting history. Nearly a quarter of a century ago, it came to the attention of several philanthropically disposed persons in Jerusalem that the condition of a very large number of children, through parental neglect and from other causes, was one that deserved the practical sympathy of the benevolently inulined. Dr. Sandreczky, a leading physician, whose practice took him among all classes, had become impressed with the large numbers of these little ones who died through neglect, or who became blind or crippled or otherwise permanently disabled, either by reason of the poverty and misery of their surroundings, or through the hardships and severities to which they were subjected.

In the year of 1872, the Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin visited the Holy Land, and the project of establishing a Children's Hospital was then brought to their attention, with the result that, through their generosity, a grant of $2,000 was secured for the maintenance of such an institution. A building was selected and the work was quickly begun, the name of "Marienstift" being given to the place in recognition of the Grand Duchess, Mary, its august patroness. Children from six months old to twelve years were admitted for treatment, about thirty being taken in with their mothers and sheltered there. 248 in all received treatment in the first three years. All who have visited the East have remarked the great number of people afflicted with diseases of the eyes. In most cases, this is directly traceable to neglect in childhood. The majority of the inhabitants of Palestine are wretchedly poor and their children suffer from this impoverishment in the last degree. The bankrupt government does nothing to relieve its needy and distressed subjects. Thus, most of the people live in unhealthy rooms, or rather dens, destitute of light and air, full of dirt and vermin; their food is reduced to a pittance of bread, greens and fruits (boiled rice or wheat are of rare occurrence), and frequently the water in the cisterns is too foul for drinking, or too scanty for a thorough cleansing. There is, under such circumstances, little hope for a child's physical or moral welfare, and when it falls sick, if it does not die, it survives only to drag through life an enfeebled body, with shrunken limbs and eyes either wholly or partially blind. Such little ones are cruelly neglected by their parents, and it is to cases of this character that the "Marienstift," devotes special attention. Within its walls the natives who are admitted are made sharers in genuine Christian family-life, which produces an impression that will not be speedily obliterated. By the aid of suitable plays and little occupations, adequate to their age and strength, the convalescent children can spend their time, after dismissal, with better things than native children are wont to do. And as the children's minds are roused up in this way, their parents, too, seeing such kindness, disinterestedness, faithfulness and scrupulousnes, carry away with them an impression that will scarcely remain fruitless in after years.

Other kindly patrons became interested in the "Marienstift" and its beneficent work among the children of Jerusalem, many hundreds of whom had improved physically and morally under its treatment and training. The average number of patients per year has been 280 to 300, including a number of mothers. In addition to this, there were many outside patients. The creeds represented by the inmates of the "Marienstift" included Moslems, Jews, Protestants, Greeks and Catholics. A majority of the little sufferers and waifs came from the great city itself, but some were from Hebron, Gaza, Nazareth and Safed and even from the land of Moab. Sick children are brought to the hospital from Christian villages by missionary societies. A great variety of diseases is necessarily treated. It must not be imagined that medical work constitutes the sole duty of the hospital staff. School and general educational work are included wherever possible, and the Gospel of Jesus is explained to listening ears and eager hearts.

SICK CHILDREN, THEIR NURSES AND MOTHERS, at "THE MARIENSTIFT," JERUSALEM

The "Marienstift" has its patrons scattered all over the world—generous Christian men and women in almost every country in Europe, in America, India, and even New Zealand—and Medical Director Sandreczky having carefully preserved its purely undenominational character, has had the good fortune to secure for the institution the friendly cooperation of every Governor of Jerusalem for the last twenty years.

This year, more than at any previous period in its history, it needs means to increase the staff and thus extend the work. More free beds and cots are needed to meet the ever-increasing demands of the patients who grow more numerous every year. During the last summer several substantial improvements were made in the work and as its necessities have always been met in the past by the help of the Lord's generous people, they will doubtless continue to be similarly provided for in the future.

MISSIONARY PERILS IN CHINA.

In a letter to The Church at Home and Abroad, Rev. Charles A. Killie, a missionary at Ichowfu, China, relates the facts concerning an attack by a mob on two native Christians, missionary helpers, Dr. Lien and Mr. Wang, the latter a medical student. He says: "After being beaten almost to death, and their eyes almost gouged out, they were dragged off, bound, bleeding and barely alive, to the yamen where the other helpers were confined, and there these four, in a room with thirty or forty condemned criminals of the worst sort, spent the night preaching of Jesus and his love. At about 1.30 A. M. a petty official came with soldiers to search our premises for stolen children, which we were accused of having concealed here. After hearing our story he took his soldiers and went back to the yamen, positively refusing to allow me to accompany him to appeal for our men who were in prison. At daylight, in a pouring rain, I went on horseback to see the official, and secured the release of Messrs. Klang and Rah, whose only offense was that they had taken my card begging for assistance; but I was refused the privilege of speaking to the other two. A guard of soldiers was sent back with us, but nevertheless we were stoned while still in the yamen, a howling mob all the while shouting, Kill the devils! Kill the foreign devils! But God restrained their hands. In the afternoon Dr. Lien and Mr. Wang were released. The next evening the Chi Hien issued a proclamation which charged us with stealing or trying to steal children, and which was calculated to excite the people again. I started instantly for the yamen to try and suppress the proclamation, but found it already posted all over the city. The official at first tried to justify himself, but by alternate pleadings and threats, I at length got his promise to withdraw it and issue a milder one."

The ringleaders of the riot were afterwards arrested and punished.

The Suffering Nestorians.

Moslem Hatred and Persecution Afflict them Sorely—Times of Trial for Christians.

THE fire of persecution against the Nestorians in Persia is still very fierce and the furnace is heated seven times hotter than ever. Mr. E. O. Eshoo, a student in the Divinity College, Toronto, and a native American, has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD extracts from recent letters from friends in Armenia, relating to the terrible hardships of the Christians there. Letters of Dr. Y. Sayad, a native missionary, and Mr. Abraham Eshoo, a divinity student, narrate the following details of the cruel murder of Baron Aghajan:

"On the 16th of last August, after morning family worship, Baron Aghajan went to his shop. At ten o'clock, a Moslem woman went to him for the purpose of selling a piece of land, but he refused to buy. Then the woman, without a word of warning, left the shop and went away. In a few minutes, the story was reported in one of their mosques that a Christian had called a Moslem woman to his shop for immoral purposes. This false report was spread by a Sayad (descendant of the tribe of Mohammed.) In a short time a mob of Loaties, a number of ruffians, Dervishes and Mollahs, made a rush for the shop in the central part of the city, where Aghajan was chatting with his friends. He was seized and thrown down on the ground, struck and beaten and then dragged along the streets to the mosque. After this a Mollah put him in a room for a short time and said to the mob, 'the mosque is not the murdering-place.' The mob outside was divided into two parts, each one anxious to kill him for an offering to their prophet. The faithful martyr was in the room of the mosque, praying to the Lord for deliverance, while outside he could hear the noise of the cruel mob thirsting for his blood. Sayad took a stone and broke one of the windows. Entering through it, with his dagger in his hand, he said to poor Aghajan, 'if you accept the creed of Mohammed, you may live; if not, let me know quickly.' As he would not deny his Lord, the dagger was thrust with great force into his body.

"Aghajan leaped through the window into the yard of the mosque. Then everybody thrust daggers into his body, till he was literally cut to pieces. They cut off his right arm and tied a rope around his neck, and the other end around the neck of a dead dog. Then the naked, mutilated body of the Christian and that of the animal were dragged through the streets of the city, more than a mile, and thrown into a filthy pond before the city gate. Some friends tried to take the body away, but the mob would not allow them till a sum of money was given to the governor, when they were permitted to take the corpse away. My beloved friend left his house as happy as usual at ten o'clock and at noon was a mangled and mutilated corpse, done to death by a Moslem mob. He was only thirty-two years when he suffered martyrdom."

The Rev. Roobil Joseph writes: "It is impossible for me to describe the terrors and horrible condition of our people. Such treatment as we have received and are still receiving from Mohammedans has not been heard of for generations. Shortly after Aghajan's death another young man was shot in the street. I cannot write to you of all the abominations we suffer from the Mohammedans."

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.

In the issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 6th, will appear the opening chapters of Marion Harland's new and delightful story which has been written expressly for our readers by this most famous of American authoresses of the present day. It is a story of the most intense interest from opening to close, and by far the best she has ever produced. Those who follow her through "The Royal Road" will find it a path of pleasantness, instruction entertainment and profit. Especially will it be attractive and helpful to the many thousands of earnest Christian families who are seeking "the better way," and whose sons and daughters are strengthened and ennobled by the study of pure and elevating literature.

"The Royal Road,"

We trust that none of our readers will miss this great pleasure in prospect.

THE BEST CHURCH LAMP.

I CARE not how many chandeliers there are in a church, how many brilliant lights there may be, the Word of God is the best church lamp. O, is there anything more beautiful than an audience gathered on the Sabbath for Christian worship! There may be no dazzle of theatric assemblage, there may be no glitter of foot-lights, there may be no allegoric images blossoming from pit to dome; but there is something in the place and in the occasion that makes it supernatural. In the light of this lamp I see your faces kindle with a great joy. Glorious church lamp, this Bible. Luther found it in the cloister at Erfurt, and he lifted it until the monasteries and cathedrals of Germany and Italy and France and England and the world saw its illumination. It shone under the trap-doors. It looked behind the curtains. It shone under the breat-plate of sacerdotal authority; and in the mosques of Turkey, and in the pagodas of India, and in the ice huts of Greenland, and in the mud hovels of Africa, and in the temples of China, God's regenerated children, in musical Tamil, and sweet Italian, and nasal Chinese, and harsh Choctaw, cried out: "Thy Word is a lamp." It throws its light on the pulpit, making a bulwark of truth; on the baptismal cup, until its waters glitter like the crystals of heaven. It strikes penitence into the prayers and gladness into the thanksgiving. It changes into a church John Bunyan's prison, and Covenanter's cave, and Calvin's castle, and Huss's stake, and McKail's scaffold of martyrdom. Zwinglius carried it into Switzerland, and John Wickliffe into England, and John Knox into Scotland, and Jehudi Ashman into Africa. I do not wonder that the stranger who sat one day beside me in a rail-car reading his Bible, after he had concluded his reading, closed it, and kissed it, and put it in his pocket. There have been times when you did the same. When all else failed you, it was so bright, so loving, it was so sympathetic a book that you, too, kissed it.

You know that the ancient Egyptians used to keep lights burning in the tombs of their dead. These lights were kept up for scores even hundreds of years. Friends would come from generation to generation and put oil in the lamps, and it was considered a disaster if those lamps went out. You and I will some day go down into the house of the dead. Some have looked upon it as an unknown land, and when they thought of it, their knees have knocked together and their hearts fainted. There were whole generations of men that had no comfort about death, no view of the eternal world, and whenever they brought their friends and put them into the dust, they said, without any alleviation: "This is horrid, this is horrid!" And it was. The grave is the deepest, ghastliest pit that ever a man looks in, unless the lamp of God's Word flashes into it. For whole ages men thought that the sepulchre was a den where a great monster gorged himself on human carcasses. "I will put an end to that," said Jesus of Nazareth; "I will with my own voice go down and make darkness flee;" and as he stepped out from the gate of heaven, all the graveyards of earth cried: "Come! Come!" And he came down, bringing a great many beautiful lights, and above this babe's grave he hung a light, and over this wife's grave he hung a light, and over this mother's tomb he hung a light, and all over the sleeping places of the Christian dead he hung a light.

Let this light gild all the graves of your dead. May this lamp be set in your parlors, in all your streets, in all your stores, in all your churches, in all your sepulchres.

DEAD POLITICIANS.

WE all ought to be vigilant about public affairs, and religiously exercise the right of suffrage; but before a man makes politics his regular business, he ought either to have so large a fortune that the emoluments of office would be no temptation, or he ought to have his integrity so fully tried in some other furnace, that he is sure to stand the political oven seven times heated.

I have buried professional politicians, and I tell you the most of them make a very hard funeral for a Christian minister to speak at. I always want at such a time an Episcopal prayer book, which, made for all cases, may not be taken as invidious or too assuming in any case. But it seems a gigantic incoherency to say over the dead body of a man who spent his life in purchasing votes and bulldozing caucuses and stuffing ballot-boxes and throwing open a free bar of vile whiskey to all applicants, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

THIS LIFE NOT ALL

HOW that old lesson takes on new emphasis! We get so used to living we hardly think of our own mortality until some startling event arouses us to think how swiftly the shuttle flies which shall finish the fabric of our earthly estate, and how soon the thread of life will be cut. There is something overwhelming in the passage of generation after generation off the stage to let other generations come on. Who are the merchants of New York to-day? Many of them children and grandchildren of the old merchants. Who are the ministers of religion in these pulpits? Nearly all of them new men, while their predecessors are gone out of service, and most of them gone out of the world. Who are the men in professional life? New doctors instead of old doctors, young lawyers instead of the old lawyers. Were it not for the light which the Gospel kindles over the next world, a wave of melancholy would drown the nations.

If this life were all and then obliteration, if this short journey ended in a gulf of nothingness, we might well sit down in despair, but with a theory that it is only the beginning and that departure is release and enlargement and coronation, the sadness is lessened if not entirely taken away. If religion is a fallacy, I do not want to find it out. I want to live and die under the glorious delusion. I want to go clear out of life under the hallucination. Rather than pay some lecturer fifty cents or a dollar to prove to me there is no hereafter, I would pay the last dollar I have, and the last coat, and the last shoe, not to believe in annihilation. But while this life is filled with doubts, and human friendship is doubtful, and health is doubtful, and worldly success is doubtful, God and Christ and the soul and heaven are everlasting certainties.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Ed. D. Reiter, Croton, Iowa. "In behalf of 'Subscriber, Chicago,' I would like to give my experience at conversion. Like 'Subscriber,' I expected to be thrilled through and through. My anguish before conversion was more I thought than I could stand; but at conversion, when I became willing to give up all for Christ, I was filled with utter peace and rest. I hardly knew myself, the load that fell off had been so heavy. I was so tired and the change was so restful and peaceful, nothing like the thrill I had expected; and yet I still know and feel his presence near. I am persuaded one never feels just as he expects, but just as Jesus sees best, and we must trust him for all, and not for a moment trust our own feelings in the matter."

Miss Bertie Brubaker, Somerset, Ind. What are the best books I can procure to aid in explaining the Bible—something that will help in study?

Jamieson, Fausett and Brown's Bible Commentary is probably the most suitable for your purpose. Write to Fleming H. Revell Co., publishers, New York.

George Anderson, Sacramento, Cal. Why did Christ describe John the Baptist as the greatest of all the prophets, and yet say that he was not so great as the least in the kingdom of God. (See Luke 7: 28)?

John had more light than any of the servants of God, who had preceded him. His message was clearer than even Isaiah's. Yet after Christ came with the crowning revelation, the humblest of those who had apprehended his meaning, was far in advance of John, and knew truths which John only dimly perceived.

M. B. French, Dayton, O., and others. When did Grace Darling die?

On October 25, 1842, Grace Horseley Darling, the heroine of the Longstone lighthouse died. The brave deed that won her fame was performed on the night of September 7, 1838, when she rescued the crew of the steamer Forfarshire. Her tombstone in Bamburg churchyard has this inscription: "Grace Horseley Darling, born November 20, 1815; steamship Forfarshire wrecked September 7, 1838; died October 25, 1842, aged 26 years."

W. S. Forsey, Fulch, Ont., and Reader, Ackermanville, Pa. When Paul wrote "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death," was it his own experience which he voiced, or the experience of an unconverted man?

His own, unquestionably. He felt within himself a dual nature, one of spiritual the other natural or material, and that the natural body or "body of death" acted as a drag on the spiritual or eternal, retarding its development. This is the experience of every Christian in whose heart the process of spiritual evolution has already begun.

Rev. T. A. Humphreys, Johnstown, Pa. "From Manger to Throne" is just received. I consider it a great treasure, and should be very happy if every family in my church possessed it. Every leaf of it from Dr. Talmage sparkles with gems, and particularly so the divine-human subject of this book.

We might easily fill "Our Mail Bag," ten times over with just such cordially appreciative letters as this. "From Manger to Throne" is sent to old and new subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who forward $2 for a year's subscription. It is indeed a great treasure," as our Johnstown correspondent writes.

Subscriber, Leck Kill, Pa. Who is the woman or the city symbolized in Rev. 17: 1, 3, 5, 6?

The general opinion of Protestant commentators is that the Church of Rome is indicated. In Rev. 17: 9, the identification is confirmed as Rome is often spoken of as "the city of the seven hills." Being drunk, is supposed to allude to the blood spilled under the various persecutions. The allusion to her vicious character is supposed to refer to her alliance with antichristian, worldly sovereigns especially to Antichrist himself with whom she will be in league until he attains supreme power, when he will cast her off (See Rev. 17: 16).

John E. Anderson, West Boylston, Mass. How can light ever be darkness, as intimated by Christ? (Matt 6: 53.)

The sense in which he used the words is seen more clearly in the previous verse. It was the familiar illustration of blindness. A man who can see is like a blind man in the dark, but when light comes, he can see his way. But the blind man is no better off for the light. His darkness is much worse than the other, because it is in him, not simply around him. In strictly accurate words, the eye is not the light, any more than the window in a house is light, but it is quite common to speak of the lights of a house, meaning its windows. The people would understand the allusion, although they would not understand the spiritual lesson Christ intended to convey, if they were without spiritual perception, or, in other words, if the light within them was dark.

Reader, Lycoming, Pa. Where can I get the verses beginning "the parish priest of Austerity," etc. and what is their meaning?

The verses asked for are as follows:

The parish priest of Austerity
Climbed into the high church steeple,
To be near to God, that he might hand
His Word down to the people;
And every day in sermon script
He wrote what he thought came from heaven,
And dropped it down on the people's heads
Two times one day in seven.
In his age, God called him down to die,
And he cried from out the steeple,
"Where art thou, Lord?" and the Lord replied,
"Down here among my people."

It refers obviously to pastors who seclude themselves in their studies, and preach "over the heads" of their congregations, instead of being shepherds in the true sense, preaching the plain, simple Gospel, mingling with the flock, healing their sorrows and molding their lives.

M. H. Savage, Indian Industrial Training School, Perris, Cal. We want to make the holiday season an enjoyable one for the Indian children under my charge. My school is new (opened last February) and we have not as yet built up a circle of friends to aid us as is done in the older schools of this class. I have an unusually intelligent and interesting class of boys and girls—over 100 ranging in age from 6 to 18 years. I expect 120 here by Christmas. They are pleased with the same trifles that are enjoyed by white children of the same ages. I have no doubt that many of your readers would be glad to send suitable articles which they have on hand and for which they have no use, if they only knew of our needs in this respect. We prefer useful things such as small articles of wearing apparel, books, etc., that can be sent by mail. We can also use a quantity of pictures in making cheerful the walls of dining-room, sitting-rooms, etc. If individual donors desired, we could have pupils write letters of thanks which would be helpful all around. Government will not provide Christmas gifts and our teachers' salaries are so small they cannot meet even a small part of the demands upon them.

Here is a very excellent way opened whereby those of our readers, who are so disposed, may give much pleasure to the Indian children at the coming Christmas holiday. The most welcome gifts will be those that come by mail. Persons living near the Institute might easily send them by express. In all cases express charges should be prepaid. Gifts of clothing, books, and toys will be welcomed.

SPAIN'S FIGHT IN MOROCCO.

SPAIN is making a hard fight to maintain possession of her stronghold on the African coast. The fortress of Melilla, a picture of which appears on this page, has been in her hands for about three hundred years. Although the Sultan of Morocco, like his predecessors, acquiesces in the Spanish occupation of the citadel, the garrison is never safe from attack. The valorous and hardy tribes of the mountainous district to the north and west of the fortress are inveterate enemies of the Spaniards and would, if they were able, wrest Melilla from her and restore it to the Moorish domain. These tribes, who are called Riffians, maintain a harassing hostility to the garrison; and the Sultan of Morocco is either unable or unwilling to subdue them. They have been in the habit of stealthily approaching the walls of the fortress and shooting at the sentries or any Spanish soldiers who might be visible, and having done all the mischief they can, they retreat beyond the Spanish lines on to Moorish ground, where the Spaniards cannot pursue them without provoking a war with Morocco. About two months ago they surrounded the fortress in large numbers, and when the garrison sallied out to drive them away, the Riffians defeated them, killed Gen. Margallo, the Commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces, and drove them ignominously back behind the fortress walls. Intermittent fighting has been going on ever since. The Spaniards receiving reinforcements and supplies of food and ammunition by the sea, and the Riffians blockading the fortress on the landside. The Spaniards fire shells among them from the fortress and from their ships in the bay, but the Riffians have sheltered themselves in trenches near the walls and have held their position. During the whole period of their occupation the Spaniards have never succeeded in establishing friendly relations with the tribes around them. They have never explored the Riff country, nor done anything toward civilizing the wild races which inhabit it. If they left the citadel or were driven from it, there would be nothing of a moral or spiritual kind left to show that a Christian people had ever been there. Probably the present trouble would never have arisen had the Spaniards availed themselves in past times of their opportunities to bring the Riffians under Christian influence. It is with nations as with churches and families and individuals, the failure to do a manifest duty entails a penalty which is often bitter and humiliating. (Dan. 4: 27.)

Gold Mining by Boat.

An impression has long been prevalent that there was gold in the mud on the bars of Snake River in Idaho. The specimens extracted, however, were so small and fine that the miners concluded it would not pay to work it. Recently, one more persistent than the others, has anchored a boat about ten miles above Payette to test the possibility of working the bars profitably. He has provided a number of buckets attached to an endless chain, each bucket capable of holding about twenty pounds of dirt. These are fixed so that they will scoop up the sand and mud and deliver it to a hopper. A small engine suffices to supply motive power. The hopper is agitated by the engine and a stream of water carries away the refuse. The gold is caught by an application of quicksilver on copper plates. Three men are employed and about a hundred tons of gravel are handled daily. The net profit so far has been a hundred dollars a day and the miners expect that in some places still better results will be obtained. The work is hard and disagreeable, but they do not mind that if they can continue to get gold out of the mud. Similar patience and persistent effort has already been devoted to obtaining precious metal from the human refuse lying submerged in the slums of our great cities. There was like incredulity about such work paying when it was first commenced, but when such men as the late Jerry McAuley are produced, there is every encouragement to proceed. The reward is assured and eternal. (James 5: 20.)

A Deferred Wedding Fee.

A clergyman in a country town in Indiana says that the largest fee he ever received for performing the marriage ceremony was one hundred dollars, and it did not come until some years after the service was rendered. The bridegroom called on the minister one evening and told him of his desire to be married, but said he was too poor to pay any fee. As he seemed a hard-working, steady young man, the minister agreed to perform the ceremony gratuitously. The young man thanked him warmly and on the following evening presented himself with the bride and they were duly married. The affair had passed altogether from the clergyman's memory for several years, when one morning he was surprised on opening his mail to find a letter enclosing a hundred dollar bill. The writer reminded him of his kindness in marrying a penniless couple and informed him that he was the bridegroom on the occasion. As the marriage had proved a very happy one, he said, and he was now in a prosperous business, he desired to make the minister a payment for his services and the enclosed represented his idea of the proper sum. Whether the writer would have sent so large a fee, or any fee at all, if the marriage had proved unhappy, he did not say. It would be a curious speculation how much money ministers would receive for such services if payment were always delayed for a few years and made contingent on the happiness of the parties. There would, however, be no such uncertainty if they were paid in that way by those whom they have led into union with

THE FORT AND HARBOR OF MELILLA, MOROCCO.

Christ. None who enter into that union ever regret it. (Rom. 8: 38, 39).

The Loudest Noise on Record.

A scientific writer in a Boston journal says that on comparing the records of distances at which cannonading on a battlefield has been heard, he finds that the record is broken by a volcanic explosion which took place ten years ago. No thunder from the skies was ever accompanied with a roar of such vehemence as that which issued from the throat of the great volcano in Krakatoa, an islet lying in the straits of Sunda, between Sumatra and Java, August 27, 1883. The explosions succeeded each other so rapidly that a continuous roar seemed to issue from the island. The critical moment was now approaching, and the outbreak was preparing for a majestic culmination. Early in the morning a stupendous convulsion took place which far transcended any of the shocks which had preceded it. This supreme effort it was which raised the mightiest noise ever heard on the globe. At Carimon, Java, 355 miles away the reports were plainly heard. At Macassar, in Celebes, the explosions attracted the notice of everybody. Two steamers were hastily sent out to find out if some ship in distress was firing signal guns. The sounds had travelled from the Straits of Sunda, a distance of 969 miles. Experience has proved, however, that sound can travel a still longer distance without being loud at all. If a telephone wire connects two distant places, an ordinary voice at one place can be heard at the other. Scientific men of a past generation would have scoffed at the idea of such communication being possible, yet the same means existed in nature then as now, only it had not been discovered. If they knew all such secrets now, they would not scoff as they often do, at the miracles recorded in the Bible, nor ridicule the faith of Christians who believe that as in olden times, a prayer whispered on earth goes up to "God's holy dwelling-place," and is heard in heaven. (II Chron. 30: 27.)

A Variable Boundary Line.

An Ohio merchant who has been spending his summer in the north and made many friends among the farmers in sparsely settled districts, reports a scheme more ingenious than honest for evading customs duties, which he found to be flourishing there. He found an extensive district where the boundary line between the United States and Canada is marked by iron posts set at intervals of a mile. A large number of farmers and traders live near the line and a good deal of smuggling was done, until the customs officers made it unsafe. Very little smuggling now goes on, but it is, the visitor says, still very profitable to live near the line. During the greater part of the year the Canadian side of the line is most populous, but at certain intervals the American side has the largest number of citizens. The farmers do not move their farms nor the traders their stores, but they move the line of demarkation. Some enterprising man found that the iron posts were not clinched on the other side of the earth, and could therefore be shifted. A few posts stand during the greater part of the year a mile south of the farms, but when all is ready, a few men go out for a night's hunting, and the next morning the United States are larger by a strip of territory a mile or two wide. The posts show that the farms are not in Canada, as was supposed, but in the United States. After a season of trade, the farms are again found to be north of the boundary line. The people are merely trying to make the best of both countries as to their property, just as some others are trying to make the best of both worlds, as to their souls. Tricks of trade and worldly methods of doing business are in operation during the week, and Christian work on Sunday. Such men may deceive themselves and the world, but we are assured, "The Lord knoweth them that are his." (II Tim. 2: 19.)

A Swedish Heiress.

A romantic story appears in the Brooklyn, N. Y., daily papers. It appears that a Swedish girl came with her brother to this country two years ago. They settled in Brooklyn, the young man getting work in a store and the girl in domestic service. The young man caught cold one day last winter, was attacked by pneumonia and died. One of his friends was engaged to be married to the girl, but after her brother's death, his attentions diminished. She had left her position to nurse her brother and after the funeral expenses were paid all her savings were exhausted and she was in debt. Her lover frequently deplored her poverty and seemed to wish to cancel their engagement. Eventually, however, the wedding day was fixed, but there was still some reluctance manifested by the young man. On the very day set for the wedding he disappeared and the girl learned that he had deserted her to marry a widow who had a small fortune. The strange part of the story is that if he had fulfilled his engagement he would be a much richer man. An uncle of the girl who was very wealthy died a few weeks ago leaving all his property to her and her brother or to the survivor if either was dead. On Nov 11, she sailed for Sweden to take possession. Her recreant lover must feel deeply mortified, but no one will sympathize with him. He is not the first man who has tried to attain his end by dishonorable conduct and has afterward found that he would have succeeded better by doing right. There are many beside him to whom the words of the prophet apply: "Your sins have withholden good things from you." (Jer. 5: 25.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A correspondent in Baltimore, Md., writes us that a most interesting revival work is in progress in that city under the charge of Dr. William Coburn, the Evangelist.

The Gaekwar of Baroda has introuced compulsory education, such as will make the boys and girls moral and useful members of society. Boys must go to school from seven until twelve years of age, and girls until ten years old.

At the annual meeting of the Loyal Legion in Chicago, General Lucius Fairchild was elected commander-in-chief for the incoming year, and Rev. H. C. Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times, was re-elected Chaplain-in-chief.

Rev. Thomas Harrison commenced a series of services on November 15 in Embury M. E. Church, Herkimer street, Brooklyn. They will continue two weeks. Dr. W. W. Bowdish, the pastor of the church, is heartily cooperating with the famous evangelist and a large harvest of souls is confidently expected.

According to the Lutheran Church Almanac, for 1894, there are now in this country 60 Lutheran synods, 5,273 ministers, 9,013 congregations, and 1,294,488 communicants. The Lutherans maintain 2,640 parochial schools, with 139,386 pupils. The largest Lutheran branch is the Synodical Conference, which reports 441,129 members.

Major D. W. Whittle assisted Dr. A. C. Dixon on Sunday, November 12, in his Brooklyn campain. He had an enormous audience in the Grand Opera House. During the ensuing week he gave talks at the John Street M. E. Church, New York, every day at noon, and in the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, every evening.

Messrs. Hunter and Crossley, the Canadian Evangelists, commenced their long promised campaign in Brooklyn at the Janes M. E. Church, Reld Avenue, on November 5. The building was densely crowded and deep feeling was manifested at both services. The Evangelists have received applications this year for their services from over five hundred places.

Mr. R. C. Morgan, the English publisher for whom the late Sir Arthur Blackwood wrote the articles on the Revelation, some of which we have republished, says that there are few things in literature more pathetic than the appearance of those articles. They were written in pencil, and show by their caligraphy how the writer was suffering while he wrote. They were the last counsels and warnings of a dying man.

The American Female Guardian Society proposes to celebrate Thanksgiving by giving a Thanksgiving dinner to the 210 children under its care at the Home for the Friendless, 29 East 29th street, New York. Dr. John Hall and several other ministers have promised to attend and give addresses. The Society is managed almost exclusively by woman, and during the fifty-nine years of its existence has temporarily sheltered over 40,000 children and found permanent homes for thousands.

The services organized by Mr. D. L. Moody for the World's Fair campaign have been much blessed. The Chicago Interior says: "The final service continued several hours and elicted the deepest interest in the congregation that filled Central Music Hall to its fullest capacity. The evangelical campaign projected by Mr. Moody has been even more successful than anticipated, and its results have already been most marked, and will continue to be felt for years to come."

Dr. Sheldon Jackson, Government Superiendent of Education in Alaska, writes that the inhabitants of the Island of St. Lawrence, lying midway between Alaska and Siberia, earnestly desire a Christian teacher. A mission church was built on the island some years ago but for some reason it was abandoned. It has stood empty ever since. Every year when the Bear makes its annual visit to the island the people come to the shore to meet it and their first question is, "Have you brought us a teacher?" The Woman's Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church hopes to send them one next year.

Mr. W. T. Stead, formerly editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, who became famous some years ago by his bold and uncompromising exposure of aristocratic vice in London, preached in Chicago on November 12. He pleaded earnestly for better and purer government of cities.

The three doctors of the mission ship Albert treated 2,250 patients while on the recent cruise to Labrador. Two hospitals have been erected, and have been found extremely serviceable. The benefits of the mission are universally appreciated, and the services of the steamer next year are greatly needed.

CHAPTER XVII

THE MISSING WEDDING-GUEST

GUY did not escape scot-free from the effects of his cold bath. It is true that he was packed off at once to the nearest cottage to get dried, and to remain there till his clothes were fit to put on, but all the same the plunge into the ice cold water, which he had taken when he was very hot, and the inevitable cold he had felt before he had been able to rid himself of his damp garments, had produced a slight chill, and for the first time since his foreign residence and travel, he had a return of cough, and looked delicate again in the hectic fashion which was always suspicious in one of his temperament. However, the change between summer and winter made a world of difference to him. He took his slight indisposition very lightly, and found it very pleasant to enter into all the preparations for the projected wedding which were now being carried on with great vigor.

It might have been a week or ten days after his complete recovery that Mrs. Dangerfield spoke to him quietly one day, and asked him if he had thought over what she had asked of him once, and if he were ready to accede to the request. Guy answered brightly and readily that nothing would give him more pleasure, and asked how it was to be done.

"We must go to London about it," answered Mrs. Dangerfield quietly, "and I will get the deed drawn up there by a solicitor in whom I have full confidence, and one who is entirely to be trusted to hold his peace on the subject. I am going up in any case, as you know, to see after various matters in connection with the wedding. You can easily frame some excuse for accompanying me."

"And I do want to go to town on my own account," answered Guy, "I have never got Monk his wedding present yet. How long do you suppose we shall be there?"

"I think four or five days will be sufficient for all I have to do. You can please yourself as to whether you remain all that time yourself or not."

"Perhaps I shall run across to Paris," answered Guy. "If Fulk could go with me I believe I would: but he must stay for the tennis ties. Well, at any rate I shall be ready as soon as you are. We will get everything settled before the wedding."

Mrs. Dangerfield was very grateful to Guy—so grateful that the old sense of irritation and injury had almost passed away, notwithstanding the fact that there were still matters connected with this question of the inheritance which she was still keeping back, and in which her conscience had told her again and again she had played a very underhand part.

It aroused no great surprise to hear that Guy was to be her companion during her short stay in town. Since her seizure during Monk's illness her children had not thought it advisable for her to travel or be much alone, and as all the rest of the party were full of business, it seemed natural enough for Guy to volunteer to be their mother's companion, and he himself felt rather like a boy out on a holiday as he set forth as his aunt's cavalier.

During the days they waited in London for the preparation of the papers that Guy was to sign, he came and went unquestioned so far as his aunt was concerned. She had her own affairs to occupy her time, and Guy was always ready to accompany her if she wished, or to [illegible] ever, he was generally his own master, and it [illegible] his aunt asked anything beyond [illegible] would be back in time for dinner. It took longer than they expected to prepare [illegible] as the lawyers perceived difficulties imperceptible to the lay mind. Guy, however, [illegible] and when the business was done he meant to [illegible] Paris and get back a day [illegible]

That event fully occupied the attention of the family and dependents at the Park and still more at the Grange, where Joyce was the best loved of all the Conway family. All the [illegible] discussed again and again until her brother grew utterly weary of them and heartily wished the whole thing were over. One day, desiring to escape giving his opinions on questions which, with a man's impatience, he regarded as of no consequence, Norman slipped away and rode over to Fordringham to have a chat with Geoffrey Northesk, whose marriage with Cissy Dangerfield was too far in the distant future to be as yet considered in detail. Geoffrey was out visiting patients, but his sister Cicely was at home, so Norman sat down to talk to his old friend, who was, he had long thought, the nicest girl in the world.

"So I hear," he said, "that Geoffrey does not mean to quit these dear, old-fashioned rooms but is taking the whole house on lease."

"Yes," answered Cicely. "He will take possession next Christmas, and he hopes to get married the following spring or summer. We shall have had time to get everything into order for Cissy: and she is as fond of this old-fashioned house as I am."

"And you, Cicely," asked Norman, in a low voice, "what will you do then? Will you have to leave it yourself?"

"That is not quite settled. Cissy thinks now that she would like me to stay; but I do not think I shall do so. I have a great idea that married people are better alone. There is plenty of time to discuss all that. I have several vague plans of my own: but they can wait."

Cicely stopped abruptly for Norman had leaned forward in the dusk, and taken her hand in his. There was something in that close quivering pressure that sent an electric thrill through her. Her heart beat suddenly thick and fast, there was a strange singing in her ears. For a moment the silence was unbroken, and then Norman spoke in such low tones, that if he had not been very near she would hardly have heard the words.

"Make one more plan, Cicely—one more, better than all the rest. One plan in which I am not left out. Have you ever thought of me when you have been thinking of your future life?"

She lifted her calm sweet eyes to his. The pale saffron glow in the west seemed reflected in them, so clear and luminous was their glance. She did not speak, but she had not withdrawn her hand from his clasp.

"Cicely, do you need that I should tell you how I love you? Have you not known the hope that has been my guiding star almost through life?"

He leaned forward a little more. She saw his face clearing in the brightening moonlight, the clear eagle-like features tense with the emotion of the moment, the deep purpose in the eyes that gave a look of true nobility to the face. It seemed strange indeed for the calm, self-possessed Norman to be so deeply stirred. Cicely let him draw her more closely to himself, and only when her head was almost resting upon his shoulder did he hear the softly spoken words:

"I think I have loved you always, Norman. If you want me I cannot say you nay."

"My darling," said Norman very tenderly and earnestly, "God bless you always for those sweet words."

Lady Conway was not much pleased with the news when Norman told her. She was an ambitious woman, and had set her heart upon a grander match for her handsome son. She considered that a young baronet with a very comfortable income and a fair property of his own could pick and choose and go wooing where he would. She had been glad to see that Yolante's influence over him was but a passing fancy: yet if he was going to marry a country doctor's daughter in the end, he was but falling from the frying-pan into the fire. However, Norman was not the kind of son to be taken to task with impunity even by his mother. He had asked Cicely Northesk to be his wife, and she had accepted his hand, and there was obviously nothing to be gained by raising objections. So on the whole she received the news well, and Norman lived through the next days in a sort of paradise of his own, so foreign to one of his habitual calmness of mind, that he could hardly believe in his own identity.

At the Park, business and pleasure filled up each day to overflowing. Every one was busy. Guy had not returned, but was expected for the wedding.

On the last morning of Monk's bachelor life, he came down dressed for riding and announced to Fulk that he was going over to the Grange to make the last arrangements. "I dare say I shall lunch there," he said, "as they will be busy, and perhaps I can be useful in helping with the decorations and things. Later on I must ride on to Fordringham, and arrange for the feast to the tenants and bell-ringers and all that. Upton has contracted for everything, and I don't think he'll make any blunders, but one never knows. I'd rather see him again about it. So don't expect me before you see me. I dare say I shall dine in the town, and come back afterwards."

Fulk looked at him gravely. A strange presentment of coming evil had come into his mind and though he was unable to define it, he felt impelled to look after Monk and protect him if need arose. He said no more then, but when his brother mounted his horse to ride across to the Grange, he found Fulk prepared to accompany him.

"Hullo, old man, do you want to see Joyce, too?"

"No, but I'll have a chat with Norman, and ride with you to Fordringham afterwards. We shan't have so many more rides together. You don't object to company, I suppose?"

"Not a bit—I like it. But fancy your turning sentimental all in a moment, Fulk."

"Well, it's not altogether that either," answered Fulk with more gravity than the occasion seemed to demand. But I've an idea that you had better not be left alone to-day, Monk.'

Monk turned on his brother a glance of amused surprise. "What's in the wind now, old fellow?"

"I am worried about that Stapleton man," said Fulk. "He has been hanging around the house these two days, I am certain. He means no good, and if I am not very much mistaken he will try and do you an ill turn."

"Let him," answered Monk scornfully, "I'm not afraid of him."

"Possibly not: but for Joyce's sake it is your duty to be careful. You shall not ride about alone after dark at all events. You will have no cause for watchfulness after to-morrow. You will be far enough away from all danger: but to-day—"

"All right, Fulk, I'll not neglect your warning. I'll be prudence itself, and I'll either come home early, or you shall be my escort, if that will be any satisfaction to you."

"Thanks," answered Fulk briefly, "I confess that it will be a decided satisfaction," and after that they rode on in thoughtful silence till the Grange was reached.

Fulk stayed to lunch as well as his brother, and rode with Monk into the town later, and assisted at the interview with Upton the innkeeper and general factotum as to the final details for the approaching festivities.

Then Joyce appeared upon the scene, and insisted that Monk should return to dinner, and not ride about any longer in the heat. Monk laughed to scorn the idea of being tired, but Joyce could always get her own way with him. He left his horse in Upton's stable, with instructions that it should be sent to the Park on the following day, and then he and Joyce drove round to see Cicely, whilst Fulk stood ruminating as to whether he might go home with an easy mind.

As there really seemed nothing to detain him longer, Fulk rode home leisurely in the declining sun-light. He kept a close look out along the road, and as he neared a part where the trees grew thick, and it was more lonely than any other portion of the high-way, he saw a long recumbent figure stretched idly out upon the grass almost concealed by the thick underwood, and caught the gleam of a pair of fiery eyes which seemed to meet his with a sort of sombre triumph and malevolence.

That of course might be merely a trick of fancy, for the man was so hidden that he could not even be recognized: but Fulk felt a sense of exaltation and triumph in the thought that his brother had been hindered from passing alone along this lonely piece of road.

A few minutes after Fulk left Upton's inn another visitor entered. It was Guy, who had just come down from London for the wedding.

"Come in, sir," said Upton, who knew him well, "come in. The best parlor is empty, and we'll get you a dinner fit for a lord in no time, eh, Betty?"

"Eh, that we will," answered his worthy spouse, who had come bustling out to welcome Guy, who was a great favorite in the town. He was looking white and fagged enough to awaken their genuine commiseration: but he did not all at once respond to their friendly overtures save by a smile and gesture of thanks.

"I am not sure that I ought not be pushing on to the Park at once," he answered, speaking slowly, as if greatly fatigued, "I want to see my cousin with as little delay as possible."

"Now come ye in, come ye in," cried the motherly landlady, "ye'll miss none of his company by biding a bit here, and getting a good dinner into ye. Young Squire isn't at the Park. He was here this afternoon and meant to stay here and dine and do a bit of business in the town: but Miss Conway came by in her carriage, and carried him off to dine with her at the Grange. And there he'll be now. So you've time to get a good meal, and be home as soon as he is. And there's his horse in the stable all ready for you if you like to ride him back. He left him with us as he had changed his plans."

Guy stood still for a moment thinking, and then stepped inside the hospitable door.

"Well, I think in that case I will stay and have something to eat, for I've had a hard day's traveling, and I'm rather tired. And you can get the horse saddled by nine o'clock, and I shall be at the Park as soon as the Squire."

The good people of the house were mightily pleased at that, and bustled about in right good earnest over their guest's comfort. Guy was glad to lie down on the comfortable lounge in the cool parlor whilst his dinner was preparing, for he was tired to the verge of exhaustion, and would have found it hard work to get home but for this timely rest.

Upton himself brought in the meal, and stood chatting of all that was to happen on the morrow in honor of the young Squire's wedding as Guy set to work upon the good cheer before him. He was faint rather than hungry, but he found his appetite as he proceeded, and the landlord nodded his head to see the color come back into his wan cheek, and he pressed him to eat and drink, till he could do so no more.

"Now," said Guy, as he rose from the table, "will you let me have the horse brought round, I must not be lingering any longer. I want to get home as soon as I can."

Guy stood at the door in the soft night air until the big animal came up. There was no moon, but the stars were bright, and at midsummer the nights are seldom really dark. He knew every foot of the road, and the horse was even better acquainted with it than himself. They would find no difficulty in getting over the ground.

Bidding a friendly good-night to his host, Guy turned the horse into the direct road for the Park and put him into a steady trot. As they turned a corner and reached the familiar stretch of timber-shaded road that led up to the Park gates, the horse started at a brisk canter. Guy did not check him, the motion was too easy and pleasant. He gave him his head, and held him lightly.

There was a sudden check—and a terrible crash. What it was Guy never knew. He felt as if he were being hurled through the air, and then a myriad brilliant sparks danced before his eyes, after which came total blank and darkness.

Out from amid the black shadows of the trees sprang a dark figure, and the barrier across the road was rapidly pulled away, the wood and furze of which it had been composed being scattered and hidden in this place and that, till no one passing the spot could guess what had happened. The horse, stunned and cut about the head and legs, had slowly risen, and was standing quietly, trembling in every limb, snuffing about as if in search of his rider, who lay rigid and motionless in a ditch nigh at hand.

The evil genius of the place came up, his need of concealment over and laid his hand upon the he e's rein.

"You con. with me," he said, "you had best not find your way home to-night. You can do that in the morning. As for you, Mr. Monk Dangerfield—" turning and spurning with his foot the prostrate figure, which he had partially concealed by some of the furze, "I think if they do take the alarm they will be some time in finding you. I saw how you fell—you have broken that bull-neck of yours to a certainty." And suddenly raising his arm aloft the man—or maniac—uttered a wild cry of triumph. "It is done, it is done at last. We are avenged—and Guy Dangerfield shall enjoy his own at last."

UNCLE JERRY.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

A WHITER or richer man than Uncle Jerry, could not be found in the State of North Carolina. A casual observer would probably have said, that a blacker or poorer man could not have been found anywhere; but as this estimate was based solely on the color of his skin and the emptiness of his pocket, it only proved that appearances are often deceptive. The skin is oftentimes the only white thing about some men, while Uncle Jerry had nothing black about him but his skin. Early in life he had plunged in a fountain that made him "whiter than snow," and ever after, the black skin could not hide the white man within it. Love reigned in his heart, coursed through his veins and shone out of his face; and the longer he lived, the whiter he became. He had no enemies, for every one who knew him was his friend. Even his neighbors' chicken roost or melon patch, could testify to his honesty. Yes, Uncle Jerry was white, all through, in spite of his black skin.

He was rich, too; very rich. For years he had been laying up treasure in a bank that had never broken, and one that had never failed to pay a large dividend. It was the Bank of Heaven, chartered by the King Eternal, and the King's Son had induced Uncle Jerry early in life to deposit his treasure in that bank. He had never regretted it, for every draft he had made on the bank had been honored, so that he was able to keep on hand a large supply of the bank's circulating medium, consisting of Faith, Hope and Charity. These he dispensed liberally as the supply was inexhaustible; in fact, the more he gave away, the more he had.

But I want you to see and hear him yourself, so you must consider this the year 1883, and enter his cabin with me. Appearances again are deceitful, for here is a cabin with but one room, a bare floor, scant furniture and poor at that, an empty cupboard, and an old bed in which you find an old man with a black skin, snow-white hair, and a rheumatism-crippled body and limbs. It is Uncle Jerry. His aged wife whom I met the night before over at the church, introduces me with the remark "Ole man, yer's de preacher man from de North, dat's come to see yer." The face of the old man lights up as he says:

"De Lord lub yer, honey, has yer come to see the old man?"

"Yes," I said. "I've come to see the old man."

"So you is from the North, is yer?"

"Yes, I am from the North."

"Well, I nebber see de North; de only thing I ebber see about the North is de north star. When I was in slavery, dey told me dar was liberty up dar in de North, so ebery night when the star could be seen, I used to go out in front of de cabin, git down on my knees, look at de star and den tell my Father in Hebben all about how we was in slavery and wanted to get up in de North whar dar was liberty. So I prayed for sixty years."

"Sixty years, Uncle Jerry; didn't you get tired waiting so long?"

"Oh no, honey, my Lord who told me to pray, also told me to wait, so I prayed and waited, but bless your heart, while I waited, I nebber let de Lord forget one single day. De answer came at last. My Father let me stay in the South, but he brought me liberty from de North."

Oh ye of little faith, how many of you have waited sixty years with a steady trust like that.

"Well, my poor brother, how are you getting along now?"

"Did yer call me yer poor brother? Why bless yer dear heart, I isn't poor, I'se rich."

"Rich," I said, "with a poor cabin like this?"

"Ah, honey, de cabin makes no difference. I'se rich."

"But you have got very little furniture, and very poor at that."

"It don't take furniture to make a man rich. I'se rich."

"But you don't look as if you had much money."

"No, I guess not. How much is dar, ole woman?"

She got out an old broken teacup, poured some coins in her lap and began counting. She had a hard time of it, as her arithmetic lessons had been sadly neglected in the days of slavery, but at last she said, "Dar's forty five cents, it I'se counted right."

"Is that all the money you have?"

"Dat's all," said the old man, "and the most ob dat we owes to de storekeeper, but honey, all de same, I'se rich."

"Well," I said, "with a small cabin, poor furniture, a scarcity of food, but little money, and you crippled with rheumatism, pray tell me where your riches come in?"

The old face fairly beamed as he answered: "Why honey, I'se got a rich Father. He's de king of de Universe. My treasure is in his bank. I'se libbin in my Father's kitchen now, but bye and bye, I'se gwine to move up in de king's parlor and I'd sooner begin in the kitchen and fotch up in de parlor, dan begin in de parlor and go down in de kitchen. Oh, my Father owns the universe, and I'm his child. He lubs me—I lub him. I lub everybody. So, honey, dat's how I'se rich." I could hardly see him for the tears that dimmed my eyes, but I drew my chair up closer to the bed, took his old, withered, diseased-twisted hand in mine, and as best I could, began singing:

My Father is rich in houses and lands,
He holdeth the wealth of the world in his hands.
Of rubies and diamonds, of silver and gold,
His coffers are full, he has riches untold.
I'm a child of the King, a child of the King,
With Jesus my Saviour, I'm a child of the King.

A hut or a hovel, what need I care,
They're building a mansion for me over there,
Though exiled from home, yet still I can sing,
All glory to God, I'm a child of the King.

The song nearly sent the old man from the kitchen, up into the King's parlor, into which, not many months after, he moved. I left that cabin, richer than when I went in, and I trust the reader is the richer for the visit, and will agree with me, that a black skin and an empty pocket, made Uncle Jerry none the less white and rich.

THE MARYS OF THE BIBLE.

Written for The Christian Herald.

AMONG Judea's vine clad hills,
In olden times, long gone, there dwelt
The mother of our blessed Lord,
No tongue can tell the joy she felt:
Her name was Mary.—St. Luke 1: 39–47.

In Bethany two sisters lived
Who with the Saviour loved to meet,
But one especially desired
To sit with reverence at his feet:
Her name was Mary.—St. John 12: 3.

When Peter from the prison went,
Delivered by an angel's hand;
The house of one he quickly sought,
Who entertained a praying band:
Her name was Mary.—Acts 12: 12.

When on the Cross the Saviour hung,
Among the mourners gathered there,
The wife of Cleophas was one,
Who raised to heaven an earnest prayer:
Her name was Mary.—St. John 19: 25.

When on the third—the appointed morn,—
The Saviour from the tomb went free;
One who was last beside the Cross,
Was first the risen Lord to see:
Her name was Mary.—St. Mark 16: 9.

When up to heaven our Lord had gone,
And men went forth to preach the Word;
Among the workers there was one
Who labored daily for the Lord:
Her name was Mary. —"MARY R."

APOCALYPTIC SYMBOLISM.

The Clue to the Discovery of the Key to the Images and Symbols of the Apocalypse.

BY THE LATE SIR S. A. BLACKWOOD.*

THE Apocalypse must be a sealed book to us till the fact is clearly apprehended that it is mainly written in hieroglyphic language. To attempt to understand all its expressions literally is to stumble fatally at the very threshold. Nor, indeed, does anyone, or any school of expositors, thus interpret it. Nobody expects to see a real material Lamb in Heaven, a real red dragon with seven heads and ten horns, a real woman clothed with the sun and the moon, under her feet, that the stars of heaven will fall upon the earth, and so on. All admit that these and a number of other expressions in the book are symbols, signs, metaphors, figures, and are not to be understood in their literal sense.

The extent to which the language is used is, however, not so fully apprehended as it should be by many; and as to the exact meaning of the symbols, and their application to this or that fact in history—whether past, present, or future—opinions naturally differ. It is well, then, to consider the symbolic character of the Apocalypse, and in a general way the method by which it should be interpreted.

I.—The symbolic character of the Apocalypse is clearly announced in its very first verse. It is "the Revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave unto him"—and he sent and "signified it;" i. e. sign-ified it, or showed it by signs or symbols—"unto his servant John." It is then a disclosure of hidden things, of future events, by means of certain hieroglyphs, to which there is a key.

This was no new method of revelation on the part of the Most High. Though employed to a greater extent and in minuter detail in the Revelation than elsewhere, symbolism or parabolic language appears to have formed an almost constant means of communicating the mind and purposes of God to the children of men. What was the whole sacrificial system, what were the institutions of tabernacle and temple, but an enunciation in symbolic terms or types of the deepest spiritual truths connected with the character of God and the redemption of men? When he would make known future events to Abraham, to Joseph, to Pharaoh, to Nebuchadnezzar, to Daniel, or to disciples in the days of our Lord, we find him employing the smoking furnace and the burning lamp, the twelve stars, the great image, the four beasts, and all the figures of the parables. At all times that word was true, "I have used similitudes." The Book of the Revelation is but a continuation of the methods adopted in both patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations. And is it not evident that there was a twofold purpose in this? For one thing, the language of hieroglyph and symbol, of type and similitude, is one that is intelligible to all. People of every nation under heaven can understand "dumb show," or a pictorial expression of thought, without any effort or linguistic attainment. No knowledge of grammar or foreign tongue is needed to convey to the mind of North American Indian, or South Sea Islander, of Greenlander, or Chinese, the needs of human nature. The little child can apprehend the meaning of visible material objects before it can articulate or understand a single word. And so to the illiterate, the simple, the poor of this world, the ranks from which the majority of the people of God appear to be drawn, the language of signs is adopted. It is cosmopolitan in the highest degree.

For another thing, it is admirably fitted to conceal as well as to reveal. "Why speakest Thou unto them in parables?" asked the disciples of our Lord. "Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given," was the solemn reply. The wisdom of this world may master the many tongues of the world; the little child in the kingdom of God can look at his Father's picture-book and learn its object lessons. To have foretold the future in other ways would, moreover, humanly speaking, have supplied a means for frustrating the prediction, or, at least, for attempts to frustrate it. But the concealment of the plans of God from the world was one of the methods by which he was pleased, silently and unknown to them, to work out his marvellous purposes.

When, therefore, he condescended to give to his servants in the churches a revelation of the things which were shortly to come to pass, and to map out the course of future history—so far as it concerned them to know it—from the time of his departure to that of his return, and even beyond, our Lord again "used similitudes."

UNSPOTTED FROM THE WORLD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Dec. 3 James 1: 27; Rom. 12: 1, 2.

AMONG the misconceptions of Christianity which have taken practical shape within the pale of the Church none are so alien to the spirit of its divine Founder as monasticism. The cloister is not the place for the follower of him who went about doing good. His prayer for his people was not that they should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evil. He wished them to be lights, to be helpers. They were to give out what they had received, to bless as they had been blessed. He was not oblivious of the danger to which they would be exposed in this path of duty. Moral contagion is deadly as is physical contagion. To come in contact with evil, to walk among snares and pitfalls, to tread earth's miry ways and to remain pure, was an infinitely more difficult matter than to be pure while living in retirement in an atmosphere of piety and spirituality. Yet in no other way could the church be the light of the world that Christ intended that it should be. His people must be exposed to the evil, or they could not do their appointed work. It was one evidence of his confidence in them and in what they would be through the power of the Holy Spirit that Christ bade them encounter the peril. He knew that, filled with the Spirit, they would be proof against temptation. This conviction is the key to the test that James applies. Pure religion is unspotted from the world. In the world but not of it. Untainted by its corruption, unsullied by its exhalations, undisturbed by its scorn. We too often forget that this test is applied. Mental, moral and spiritual purity is the best and truest evidence of religion in the soul. If it is absent, what is the natural inference? If the Christian acts on the world's maxims; if his business is conducted on the world's principles; if in dealing with him there is need that the business man be wideawake lest he be over-reached; if his employes are poorly paid and are treated as machines; in short, if selfishness is the spirit that dominates his life, the test proves his standing; he is not unspotted from the world. How many young men starting out in life with high ideals, have to look back on them after a few years as impracticable! They have discovered that they cannot retain them and win the world's prizes, too, and they have compromised here and there, until the spots on the robe have brought its hue to the worldly shade. The difficulty comes from the fact that we do not realize the enormous power that is put within our reach. The power which so filled the Lord that he could say the tempter has "nothing in me" is at our command. It renders the man whom it inhabits impregnable and the evil of the world finds no place to which it can attach itself, no unoccupied space in which it can lodge. The force of Christianity is more positive than negative. It is an active force so intent on doing good that temptation is driven far away, and is vanquished almost without a conflict.

TWO BEAUTIFUL LIVES.

On this page are portraits of two ladies whose work for God and humanity will be had in everlasting remembrance. The elder of the two is Mrs. Robert Pearsall Smith and the younger, her daughter, Miss Alys W. P. Smith, who is the Secretary of the English section of the King's Daughters. No one could have been found so suitable for that responsible position. She had been identified with the Order in her American home almost from her childhood; and before the Order was established, she had been familiar with its principles, which were the principles that must rule in any household of which her saintly mother was the head. After her graduation, she followed her family to England and promptly entered the numerous activities with which her mother had become identified. Lady Henry Somerset found in her an energetic colleague in her temperance work, and the sisters of the West London Mission cordially welcomed her to their sisterhood. She also joined a movement for the administration of such industrial capital as can be conveniently managed socially, which has the promise of initiating a more extended experiment in Christian socialism. One who knows her better than any one else, writes: "I never knew the time, from her earliest childhood, when she was not a simple, trusting Christian; and every one, I think, rich and poor alike, would bear testimony to her Christ-like unselfishness and thoughtfulness for others." To such a nature the work of the King's Daughters is a natural and congenial service, and the members of the Order in England have done wisely in confiding to her experienced hands the administration of its secretarial department.

Her mother has long been famous in all religious circles in our land. Her services with tongue and pen have laid thousands of women and girls under eternal obligation to her. In Pennsylvania and New Jersey she is perhaps better loved than elsewhere, for the people of those States know her best. In the quaint old stone house at Germantown, Pa., where she lived so long, she has welcomed at one time or other hundreds of her sisters from near and distant cities, who longed to be for a few days under the charm of her personal influence and to have the benefit of her Christian counsel in some domestic difficulty, or in their public work for Christ. Thousands more made her acquaintance through the Bible Readings she conducted, and the name of Hannah Whitall Smith is one they will never forget. To the employes in her husband's glass factory in New Jersey she is endeared by many acts of kindness, and they regard their employer's Quaker wife as their dearest and wisest friend. To a still larger public she became known as Superintendent of the Evangelistic Department of the W. C. T. U. But it is through her pen that she has attained world-wide influence. Her initials, H. W. S., on a tract or leaflet ensure its careful reading and preservation by thousands, who know that what Hannah Whitall Smith writes is sure to be bright and helpful.

Eager hands translate these productions into German, Swedish, French, Italian and every civilized language and circulate them as the most useful aid to evangelical work. In all these lands, especially in our own, her famous book, The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life, has had a large circulation. Many are the homes it has brightened and many are the lives it has been used of God to transform. From it the worldling has learned where true happiness is to be found, and the Christian has learned how his religion ought to influence his life. By her life and by her writings she has proved that religion is not the dull and gloomy thing that many people think it.

AN AUTHORITATIVE DECISION.

The project of establishing or maintaining a connection between the Epworth League and the Christian Endeavor Society is pronounced impracticable by the chief authority of the former organization. We presume that his decision will dispose of the idea throughout the whole Methodist Episcopal Church. It is matter for regret that the two powerful organizations which have the same object in common are debarred from acting in unison, but the situation must be accepted for the Bishop's decision is unequivocal. It was given in reply to a letter from a member of an Epworth League of Christian Endeavor, who wrote to Dr. Fitzgerald for his opinion. In the course of his reply the Bishop said: "The Methodist Episcopal Church cannot accord to societies that recognize another jurisdiction or authority, and that act under another constitution, the same rights and privileges that it grants to societies that are organized under the authority of its own General Conference and operate under the constitution which that General Conference has enacted. In said constitution there is a provision under which any youung people's society may become an affiliated chapter of the Epworth League. This provision has been, by some persons, misunderstood. They seem to think that under it a society may be at one and the same time a chapter of the Epworth League and a chapter of the Christian Endeavor Society. In this they are mistaken. At the time the constitution was enacted there were (as there had been for many years preceding) in nearly all of our local churches, young people's societies that were under the control of the pastor and the quarterly conference; and the object of the provision referred to was that the status of those societies might not be disturbed, but that they might, if they so desired, without dissolving and reorganizing, become affiliated chapters of the Epworth League. That is, not having been born as children of the League, they might, by complying with specified conditions, be affiliated, adopted as children, by the League, and at once be placed upon a footing with the other children—or chapters. When a child receives adoption, is affiliated, its relations to its former parents cease. So with young people's societies organized in the Methodist Episcopal Church. When once affiliated, adopted by the Epworth League they must not, they cannot, recognize any other parentage."

MRS. HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.
(Author of "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.")

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

At the recent Michigan Convention of Baptist Young People's Unions, President W. H. Merritt made a suggestion which deserves the attention of the Union in other States. The return from Headquarters to the State Union Treasury of five per cent. on the money paid for badges, etc., is generally placed to the general account; but as it is an outside contribution, extraneous to the ordinary sources of income, Mr. Merritt advises that it be returned to Headquarters, as a subscription to the Founding fund. Michigan has done this, and if every State will do likewise the addition to that fund will be considerable.——The Union is making rapid progress in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. At the recent Convention at Waterford, a large number of delegates attended from Brantford, Simcoe and other cities, and all reported earnest work, increased interest and growing numbers in their respective districts.——At the Convention of Massachusetts Unions, held lately at Cambridgeport, eighty-three towns and cities were represented by delegates. The Secretary said there were now eight Associational Unions in the State. There are still 130 Churches whose societies prefer to maintain their connection with the Christian Endeavor movement to joining the Baptist Union and seven others have compromised by changing their name to Baptist Union of Christian Endeavor. The new President of the Massachusetts State Union is Rev. J. K. Wilson of Taunton; Secretary, Rev. M. T. Johnson of Middleborough; and Treasurer, Mr. F. E. Crawford of Watertown.——At the beginning of this month the Founding fund had reached a total of $14,670.

The Family and Home Circle

A Baby Potentate.

How the Four-Year-Old Son of the Emir of Afghanistan Entertains his Guests.

LONG ages of subserviency to royalty among the peoples of the Old World have produced certain conditions which appear anomalous to our Western eyes. The illustration on this page, which is reproduced from a sketch made by an artist of the London Graphic, shows an incident of not infrequent occurrence in Eastern royal courts. Little Prince Mohammed Omer, the youngest son of the Emir of Afghanistan, celebrated his fourth birthday on Sept. 15. His mother, Princess Halima, is very proud of her baby prince, who may some day be the ruler of the great province northwest of India which has for generations been a scene of strife and bloodshed.

On the Mohammedan New Year's Day (March 21) Dr. Gray the Surgeon-General to the Emir and Mr. Collins, a geologist now in that country, paid a visit of congratulation to the Sultana. They were received by the little Prince Omer, of whom Dr. Gray writes as follows: "He is a bright-eyed little fellow, with a fair skin and dark hair. He has a fine suite of rooms in the Erg Palace, furnished in European style; and he has also his Chamberlains, his Commander-in-Chief, his wives, servants, horses and signet. The rooms communicate with the harem, and the Sultana deputes him to receive and entertain those of the visitors who cannot enter the harem. The youngster received us with courteous dignity—an amusing imitation of the Emir's manner. He ordered tea to be brought, and proceeded to entertain us in the way that struck him as most suitable—he sent for his toys. They were clever mechanical ones from London and Paris, and he gave a demonstration of their working, solemnly watching our faces to see if we were amused. He asked if we would like some sweets; we assented, whereupon he called for pen and paper, and proceeded to write an order upon his storekeeper for a trayful. I need scarcely say the writing was understandable only by those who had heard the order given. When the sweets were brought he warned us not to eat them too fast, lest we should be ill. He rather wanted to join in, but his tutor hinted to him in a whisper that he had eaten enough already. There was a crowd of little slave-boys round him—Kaffirs and Hazaras and others, prisoners of war, whose parents had been concerned in some of the numerous risings. The Prince made me a present of one of them, telling me to choose the one one I liked best. Of course I made some excuse. We asked if the Prince spoke Afghani. The tutor said, 'No; he was learning.' But the Prince said he could, and he lisped out two or three words."

Hakim, the little prince's tutor, acted as interpreter during the reception. The young potentate took special pleasure in showing the visitors his ornaments and trinkets, which were mainly of German make. He then led them out to the palace gardens which overlook the Shah-bagh Valley and afford a clear view of the distant Hindu-Kush mountains. When the time arrived to withdraw, the little prince shook hands with his callers, saying: "Khushamadeh" ("You are welcome"), and they bowed themselves out.

Christmas Images in Mexican Homes.

Our Mexican neighbors have some strange Christmas customs, not the least odd among them being the jornada or journey, in which several families usually participate and which Mrs. J. P. Lawyer, writing from Guanajuato, describes as follows:

"A group of images representing the Virgin Mary seated on a donkey, and Joseph leading or guiding it, on their way to Bethlehem, is bought by some person able to do so, and he, with a few invited friends, commences the festivities on the evening of the 16th of December. They all, save one family, go to the house of that one, carrying the images, and sing half an hour or more before the closed door there is opened. The image is carried in, placed upon a table, and surrounded by various kinds of ornaments. After the people are seated, a kind of large griddle cake, made of flour and fried in lard, with a syrup poured over it, also other kinds of food and wine (if the family living there can afford it) are passed around, more singing and music by an orchestra follow, and the entertainment is concluded by a dance. The images are left at this house until the next evening, when they are taken to the home of another family of this party, and the scene of the previous evening is repeated.

"Every evening the programme is the same until Christmas eve, when the group is taken to the home of the owner, where the image of a babe is added. Singing and music are kept up until the moment the clock strikes twelve, when the owner of the image and his wife bring forward the image of the babe and kiss it, all present following their example. The image is then placed upon what they call an altar, decorated with evergreen, tinsel and tissue paper ornaments, with a large tray of nice candies and other sweetmeats near. After all are quietly seated, the candies and sweetmeats are passed to the image of the babe, to that of the virgin and the friends present. Singing, instrumental music and dancing follow, as on the previous nights. The group of images remains in this house on the highly decorated altar in one corner or side of the room until February 2d, Candlemas day, so named from the great number of candles used in their special services on that day, commemorating the purification of the virgin, when they have another feast similar to the others, and the image of the babe is taken from the altar and put in its regular place in the house until the following year."

One Girl's Influence.

"A young girl went from home," writes Mr. Sangster, "to a large school where more than usual freedom of action and less than customary restraints were characteristics of the management. She found very little decided religious life there—an atmosphere, upon the whole, unfavorable to Christian culture. But she had given herself to the Lord for all that she was worth, and she could live nowhere without letting her light shine. In a very short time she found two or three congenial spirits, more timid than herself, but equally devoted. A little prayer meeting began to be held once a week in her room. On Sundays, in the afternoon, a few of the girls came together to study the Bible. Before the half year was over, the hallowed flame had swept from heart to heart, and there was a revival in that school."

Listening that is Helpful.

Christian people should cultivate the habit of giving a candid and sympathetic hearing to what is said in the pulpit. You will make your preacher a better preacher thereby. He will take greater pains in preparation than ever, that he may deserve your attention. All can help in this way. The poorest can render more assistance than they think.

A poor widow was lamenting to Lyman Beecher that she could do nothing. He said: "You can do something. You always help me when I preach. She listened as if an angel spoke. She drank in his words as the thirsty ox drinks in water. The tearful eyes and quivering lip told of her appreciation and enjoyment.

Every preacher has in his heart thanked God a thousand times for such hearers. They help from the start. The speaker feels the current of their sympathy calling all his faculties into play, as the bursting buds feel the sweet influence of the spring.

I would not wish to know the future,
Be it dark or bright,
But resting in the love Eternal,
Let me do the right.
And with my Lord it will be heaven,
Whether noon or night.

THE COVERT OF HIS WINGS

IN the covert of thy wings I will trust, [blast,
I will hide me there for shelter from the
With thy pinions overspread, blessed Lord,
I will calmly rest me, till the storm be past.

Though tempest, lowering from all around,
And the dark and ashen clouds are rent in air,
I'll nestle 'neath the covert of thy wings,
For no danger from without can reach me there.

Blest haven for the weary and opprest;
Booth of mercy for the pilgrim on his way;
Point us all, dear Father, toward its rest,
When our souls are overwhelmed by dismay.

In its calm and peaceful rest bid us stay,
Till the storms that wildly rage about us cease.
Till we reach the stormless realm of the King,
And we rest our souls in heaven's eternal peace. —REV. I. MENCH CHAMBERS.

REAL REST AND ITS VALUE.

THERE are many women who don't know the meaning of that simple word, Rest. The many cares devolving upon a woman are apt to make her mistake her vocation in this quality of necessary idleness. The thrifty woman is proud of her many achievements, and when the responsibility if not the actual doing of household labor, has a breathing spell, she catches up the darning-bag and goes to work latticing the holes restless little toes have made, or those made by the larger and more restless pedal appendages of her liege lord; or she will rip up an old skirt she means to make over for the coming season; or, again, she will go on with that dainty bit of lace work or embroidery which is delightfully wearying to the eyes. She will do anything rather than remain idle, idleness being the bane of the thrifty woman, and something she almost regards as a crime. She will even say that these things rest her, that she merely sits down and rocks and amuses herself. She never made a greater mistake in her life. Variety in labor is not the rest needed; the man who put out the idiotic maxim of "Do the next thing" must have had hopes of discovering perpetual motion applied to the animal called man. "The next thing" is often the worst thing to do, the time comes in every day of a busy woman's life when "the next thing" she does should be nothing, strictly nothing. Absolute supineness is the meaning of the rest we speak of. There is a couch conveniently at hand, and fifteen or twenty minutes spent upon it in the latter part of the day will do much for a woman if she permits her mind while thus lying to go as near to being a perfect vacuum as possible. More especially to housekeepers should this be addressed, for theirs is a life of tiresomeness of which few but themselves have any conception.

Taking out the Tangles.

Lots of tangles in every life! Strong and eager and full of purpose as many of our young people are, these stirring days, there comes at times to the best of them an almost overpowering sense of weakness. Then it is that the wise ones turn for strength to the One whose hand is ever extended to give help. Not long since, says the Union Gospel News, two little lads were well-nigh in despair over a kite string that they had succeeded in getting into a seemingly hopeless tangle. "Let's give it up and take it to mother," cried one at last; "she can always get tangles out that are too much for us." And the skilled fingers of the parent patiently extricated the close-drawn knots. How illustrative that is of the way the heavenly Parent undoes the perplexities of daily life for those who seek his aid!

"Only Loving."

Love is universal. A baby carriage stood in front of a small shop. In it slept a pretty dimpled baby. A drowsy puppy lay on the pillow, its black nose close to the baby's cheek. By the carriage stood a ragged little waif, dirty, and but half clad. She stroked in turn the baby and the puppy. A lady, passing by, noticed the strange picture,—the beautiful baby, the little dog, the ragged child. The baby's mother was in the shop. "Are you caring for these?" said the lady to the waif. A smile lit up the dirty little face. "No, please, ma'am, I'm only loving them."

BRINGING BACK THE KING.

A Recent Sermon by Dr. A. J. Gordon, Pastor of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass. II. Samuel 19: 10, "Now, therefore, why speak ye not a word of bringing the King back?"

DR. A. J. GORDON.

THE history of David furnishes a wonderful prophecy and prefigurement of that of David's son, Jesus Christ our Lord. By the rebellion of Absalom, King David had been driven into exile, and was wandering a homeless stranger. The son who had so wronged and dishonored him, had now been slain in battle; the nation was distracted and the people were at strife throughout all the tribes of Israel. In the midst of this confusion, and amid a multitude of counsels, one suggesting one thing and another another, the cry was heard: "Now, therefore, why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back?" And David, from sitting at the gate, rose up and sent word to the elders of Judah, saying: "Why are ye the last to bring the king back to his house? Ye are my brethren. Ye are my bone and my flesh. Wherefore, then, are ye the last to bring back the king?"

So spake David. Let us now turn to the story of the Son of David. When Jesus of Nazareth was born, this prophecy was spoken concerning him by the angel: "And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever." But his rebellious people rejected him and drove him away. Instead of a coronation, they gave him a crucifixion. And so far from being King of Israel, he has for nearly two thousand years been in exile from earth; seated on his Father's throne, indeed, but utterly denied the throne of Israel. And what is the state of things in his absence? War, misrule, anarchy and suffering—enough to make one swoon with heart-sickness, who stops to think of it all. And the world is full of expedients for bringing deliverance to the race. Moral reforms, social reforms, labor reforms, political reforms, church reforms—I do not disparage these in the least. They are significant symptoms of the world's unrest and of its irrepressible yearning for deliverance. But amid this universal striving after human amelioration, I take up this ancient question, "Now, therefore, why speak ye not a word of bringing back the King?" On the authority of all New Testament teaching, and in the light of nineteen centuries of history, I declare my conviction, that the only hope for the world is in the return of Jesus Christ to reign over the earth, to establish universal peace and to bring it into subjection to his authority. Upon this proposition I wish to speak at length:

I. The return of our Lord in glory is the only hope of the Church.

I do not say merely that it is her only Scriptural hope, which is perfectly true; but that it is her only hope as proved by her actual experience of nearly two thousand years of earthly pilgrimage. It is the dream of many that the whole world is to be speedily brought into subjection to Christ through the preaching of the Gospel. That the church is to witness for Christ in all the world is according to our Lord's prediction, and conforms to his distinct command. But that all nations are to be brought into obedience to the faith in this present age, is not stated in Scripture. Would that it might be so if such were God's will. But what signs of such a consummation are now visible? Nineteen hundred years are nearly completed since Jesus gave the great commission, and still we are confronted with the appalling fact that the great majority of [illegible] in the world. Of earth's fourteen hundred [illegible] practically unaffected by the Gospel: while of the less than four hundred millions who are nominally [illegible] great apostate systems—the Greek and the Roman Catholic Churches, which are Christian only in name, while heathen in fact. Then consider that of the Protestant and so-called [illegible] spiritual Christians is so small that a candid judgment must pronounce it still true, that the real church of God is only "a little flock" compared with the great multitudes who are outside the fold.

The golden age of missions is upon us, for which we give unspeakable praise to God; but is the golden age of universal righteousness and peace therefore rapidly emerging? Alas, we must confess that it is not. Dr. Johnston, an ardent promoter of the Gospel among the heathen, declares in his "Century of Missions" that in spite of the marvellous triumphs of Christianity in the last hundred years, the heathen conquests have outstripped the Christian, seventy to one; or in other words, that for every Christian won from the heathen by spiritual birth, seventy have been added to the heathen by natural birth. Noble army of converts gathered out of every kindred and tribe and nation, during the last century—three millions according to a common estimate! Yet Dr. Post of Syria, an eminent authority on the subject, declares that during this same missionary century, thirty millions have been added to the ranks of Islam. Thus while the conquests of missions elate us, such statistics as these, appall us; and they compel the question, "How long at such a rate will it take to bring all the world to Christ?" In seeking an answer to this question, why do so few make any mention of "bringing back the King?" The devout and thoughtful essayist, John Foster when confronted with these facts, replied: "At the rate of progress hitherto of genuine Christianity on the globe, thousands of years may pass before the millennium can arrive—an awful mystery in the divine government. But one cannot help indulging the hope, through resting on loose and arbitrary speculation, that there may come in some not very distant period, a mighty acceleration with unprecedented and astonishing events of the reforming process." There are some devout and thoughtful readers of the Word, who strongly look for just this "mighty acceleration," and they rest this hope not on any arbitrary speculation, but upon the more sure word of prophecy, which is to them a "light shining in a dark place." And yet this belief gives offence since it seems to imply that the Gospel is a failure, and that the world is not growing better but worse. We do not pause upon these questions, except to say that the Gospel has failed in no sense, since it has accomplished exactly what at the outset it was predicted to accomplish, viz: gathered out an elect people for Christ; and that the world is growing both better and worse. The brighter the light the deeper the shadow which it casts. As the light of Christian missions is kindling the whole horizon of the setting century with its glow, what do we discern? The tokens of the day-dawn of universal peace? No! Statesmen rather read the signs of a war of unprecedented fierceness yet before us. Instead of the swords being beaten into ploughshares, colossal armies are gathering for the fray; so that Major General Tyrrell estimates that the standing armies of Europe have so steadily increased of late, that whereas in the days of the Crimean war, the soldiers under arms, numbered three millions to-day they number more than twenty millions.

But you will ask, is there not a marked amelioration of society under the benign influences of education and scientific advancement which this century has witnessed? Alas, that here again such a distressing picture confronts us. Recently compiled statistics, which we have not heard disputed, declare that with the last decade, the number of murders in the United States has multiplied six times; while in the present year, not only does the ratio keep up, but such a carnival of violence has been witnessed, as to mark the last twelve months as the annus mirabilis of crime in the history of our country. And while we rejoice in the splendid victories which the Gospel has wrought in heathen lands, the evidences are too apparent to be questioned that Satan is outflanking the missionary army at every point. If within fifty years, the missions of Christian nations have won thirty thousand converts in China, the avarice of Christian nations has brought a hundred and fifty millions of souls in that great empire under the doom and damnation of the opium curse. Add to this the liquor traffic pushed into Africa by the people of so-called Christian England and America, and dogging the steps of the missionary at every point and slaying its hundreds where the Gospel saves one; then give one sickening glance at the system of licensed vice in India, and then pause and reflect. Cheer us with statistics, oh missionary enthusiast, and we will outdo you in rejoicing at the blessed results o the Gospel among the nations. But permit us, with the whole church of the first three centuries, and with thousands of the most devout and thoughtful of our time to cry, "O, King Immanuel, return!" The experience of eighteen centuries is sufficient to prove to us that no power can stop the march of crime till he shall take unto himself his great power and reign; that no final check will be put upon the sin and violence of this earth till at the descent of Christ from heaven, Satan is "bound and cast into the bottomless pit" (Rev xx, 1), and that there will be no disbanding of standing armies till he shall come who "maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth, who breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder, and who burneth the chariot in the fire."

II. We must affirm with equal emphasis, that there is no hope for dispersed, afflicted and wandering Israel, till Jesus appears in glory "to turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

If deliverance could come to the Jews by their own might or power, such deliverance ought to be close at hand. For the Hebrew nation has latterly risen into such astonishing pre-eminence, that it holds the purse-strings of the world. It has become an accepted saying that no nation of Europe can now go to war without the permission of the Jewish bankers; and that no political measure can ignore in the parliaments the influence of the Jewish editors who now hold the controlling voice in the press of the greatest nations. It would seem ar though Israel has money enough to buy back her ancient heritage, the Holy Land, and influence enough to change the unfriendly public opinion concerning her people if she would. But as a matter of fact, she is still under unspeakable affliction. Amid the light and tolerance of the last decade of this nineteenth century, a persecution has broken out against the Jews of Russia, surpassing in extent that instigated by the wicked Torquemada in Spain four hundred years ago. Ostracism, pillage, violence, plunder and death are now being visited upon the three millions of this nation dwelling in Russia, and the surrounding provinces, which probably surpass in cruelty any bloody drama of the century. If one would find occasion for tears and unutterable grief, let him read in "Darkest Russia," the story of what is now passing. There is no end to humanitarian schemes for relieving this vast suffering created by Russia's persecuting edicts. Jewish bankers are pouring out their funds; Jewish colonization societies are buying land and fostering emigration; Christians missions are extending the love and sympathy of the Gospel; and may God's richest blessing rest upon all these efforts.

But "why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back?" For it is painfully apparent that all other agents can do but little to mitigate this awful woe.

Joseph Rabinowitz, the most remarkable convert to Christ, as some believe, since Saul of Tarsus, declares that there is but one hope for Israel, and that is in the return of their Messiah, and the nation's acceptance of him, as their long expected king. So also speaks the word of God, from the bold sermon of Peter, when to the "Men of Israel," he said, "Repent ye therefore and be converted that your sins may be blotted out, that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and he may send Jesus who before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things," to the great discourse of Paul in the 11th of Romans, ending with the words "And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written: There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." A hymn which has come down to us from the 12th century embodies our true prayer and Israel's true hope.

Draw nigh, draw nigh, Immanuel
And ransom captive Israel
That mourns in lonely exile here
Until the Son of God appear.
Rejoice, Rejoice, Immanuel
Shall come to thee, O, Israel!

Blessed hope for the sons of Abraham as for the disciples of Christ!

Joseph is soon to be made known unto his brethren, who cruelly afflicted his soul, and when the recognition comes, all the house of Pharaoh shall hear the weeping. Well may we anticipate this event in the words of blessed Samuel Rutherford: "Oh, to see the sight, next to Christ's coming in the clouds the most joyful! Our elder brethren the Jews and Christ fall upon each other's necks and kiss each other. They have long been asunder. They will be kind to one another when they meet. O, day! O longed for and lovely dawn! Sweet Jesus, let me see that sight that will be as life from the dead Thee and thy ancient people in mutual

III. It is remarkable that nature, animate and inanimate, should be represented in Scripture as longing for the Lord's return.

It too feels the curse and consequences of sin and instinctively sighs for the coming of that great Deliverer who alone can lift that curse. "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, waiting for the adoption, to wit the redemption of the body." (Rom. 8: 22.) That is the resurrection that is to take place at Christ's coming, is longed for and waited for by suffering nature, as well as by suffering man.

Have we reflected how much the brute creation is now enduring from the consequences of man's sin? It were well for us to study this lesson sometimes from the teachings which are within easy reach.

If you see what you can witness every day, the horse lashed unmercifully under the hands of some brutal driver, stop and ponder the lesson which is taught you. It is on account of man's cruelty and hardness of heart that all this cruelty is endured. The poor brute has committed no sin, but has obeyed his master the best he knew how. Yet the teamster, whose temper has been inflamed by drink, rains his furious blows upon his beast; the reckless lad who enjoys the fun of swinging a whip, raises long stripes upon the back of the patient animal, and they that look on rarely protest against the injustice. It is an evidence of the love of the gospel that societies have sprung up "for the prevention of cruelty to animals." May God prosper their humane endeavors! But, alas! cruelty deepens as mercy brightens. The same age which has witnessed the rise of these societies for brute protection has witnessed the introduction of vivisection, or the dissection of living animals under the most awful tortures which scientific cruelty can invent. Any one can read the horrible details of this last achievement of nineteenth century progress who desires; the story of burning irons thrust through the brains of dogs, and the record of their actions under the process; the account of a spaniel's brain transfixed for a whole month with a sharp needle, and all the symptoms manifested during that time. These investigators desire to test the strength of natural affection in animals, and so they cut open a mother-dog in the sight of her little family, and while lying in exquisite torture they bring her puppies to her. The artless record is that "she immediately fell to licking and fondling them as well as she was able." If the operators had recorded a true verdict they would have declared that brute affection appeared in marked contrast with the tender mercies of men "without natural affection." It may be said, not irreverently, upon this subject that "if for six thousand years the animal creation has been pursuing the Via Dolorosa of its suffering on account of man's sin, in the Nineteenth Century it has reached its Golgotha under the vivisectionists crucifixion."

These illustrations are enough, although thousands might be cited, to verify the words of Scripture, that "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now." Well has one called attention to the fact that "all the sounds of nature are in the minor key—the bleating of the sheep, the lowing of the cattle, the moaning of the winds, the murmur of the waves. Nature feels the curse heavy on her heart, and so she gives utterance to a continued miserere."

All honor now to those who are striving to mitigate the woes of the animal creation by humane societies and outspoken protests. But why do none say a word about "bringing back the king?" Nature with a truer instinct than that of a sleeping and secularized church, seems to know no other remedy but the return of Christ, to wipe away creation's curse. Hence this beautiful saying in Rom. 8: 19: "For the earnest expectation of the creation, waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." I wish I could put into language what is contained in the original of this text. Nature is represented as stretching forth the neck, as watching with strained attention towards a distant point in the heavens, from which the Deliverer is to come. It is creation calling by a graphic and eager attitude "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

I have often been impressed with the rebuke which the dumb animals administer to us, by their submission to the laws of their Creator. And I need not remind you how often God uses this rebuke against us; contrasting our slow obedience with that of the ox, which "knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib;" with the "stork in the heavens which knoweth his appointed times, and the turtle and the crane and the swallow the times of their coming." I have frequently taken the lesson to heart. As I have seen the unresisting submission of the poor horse to its driver's abuse, I have said, "Oh, that I had like patience under injustice!" As I have seen the engine horses, at the first stroke of the fire-alarm, leap to their places and with eager eyes and dilated nostrils and outstretched necks, dash away to the rescue as though the salvation of the city depended on them, I have said, "Oh, that I may be found as instantly ready and as watchfully alert for my Master's call as these dumb creatures." Blessed hope which the Advent of Christ holds out even to the brute creation. As it is written, "The creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

4. The slavery of man is not less deplorable than the oppression of the brute creation which is everywhere visible.

The cathedrals of Europe, like the pyramids of Egypt, while splendid monuments of human greatness, are also sorrowful monuments of human oppression. Gaze upon these lofty piles and pictured windows and then think of the thousands of poor workmen who toiled year after year, for a few pennies a day, to rear these structures. And now the fashion has changed, and instead of colossal temples men are rearing colossal fortunes, and the builders of these also cry out because of the oppression of their task-masters. I do not here enter upon the controversy between the laborer and the capitalist. It is enough to say that it cannot be according to the divine order that a few men should hold millions upon millions of useless wealth, enabling them to revel in luxury and idleness, while myriads of their fellow men have to toil from morning to night for a bare subsistence. It is not strange that in these circumstances there should be unrest and a loud clamor for relief. And "labor reform" and "Christian socialism" are bringing forward their schemes for the amelioration of the workingman. But why do so few speak of "bringing back the King?" This is the only remedy which God has revealed to us. Read the fifth chapter of the Epistle of James. There you have an inspired picture of the contest between labor and capital. There is first the condemnation of the rich oppressors. "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for the miseries that shall come upon you. Ye have heaped treasure together in the last days." Startling words! Mammoth fortunes in the hands of a few are a sign of the end. And mark you, this sign has never been seen as it is now visible. How graphic the description! "Ye have lived in pleasure and been wanton. Ye have nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter." And then you catch the sounds of the labor agitation. "Behold the hire of the laborers, who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." And what does the Lord advise? Strikes—dynamite—revolution—anarchy? No! "Be patient therefore brethren unto the coming of the Lord." Bear your oppression, submit to your hardships. "Grudge not against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned. Behold the Judge standeth at the door" When he comes he will arbitrate justly between the oppressor and the oppressed, between the capitalist and the laborer. The only man good enough and righteous enough to be entrusted with authority over men will now take the reins of government into his hands. These things will be wonderfully reversed, as it is written in that grand Messianic Psalm, the 42nd, "All kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him; for he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also and him that hath no helper." This is the gospel of comfort for the laboring man which the Scriptures furnish. I can find no other. It may seem very remote and unpractical; but it is wonderful how God's message is always found to fit. Lord Shaftesbury, who was an earnest lay preacher as well as noble philanthropist, says, that in addressing the poor weavers of Spitalfields he thought he would use this Gospel of James to learn what effect it would have upon these overworked, weary and half-fed laborers. And so he expounded to them this message: "Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." And as he told them of a King soon to come; one who himself had known poverty and hardship; one who had been a working-man, laboring at the carpenter's bench, one of our own flesh and blood, and able therefore to enter into sympathy with our every condition: as he set forth the blessed reign of this King, how he would right all wrongs, and end all oppression and reward all patient endurance, it was wonderful, he said, how it cheered and uplifted these poor laborers. And yet not wonderful. The gospel was made for man, and not man for the gospel. Preach it as God gave it to us, and we shall find that it fits into human hearts, as the key fits into the lock for which it was made.

V. Consider yet another theme to which our text applies. There is one sorrow which belongs alike to all—to the master and to the slave, to the rich and to the poor—the sorrow over the death of our beloved ones. There is one universal grief.

"There is no flock, however watched and tended
But one dead lamb is there:
There is no fireside, howsoe'er defended,
But has one vacant chair."

What hope and comfort have we in the face of this sorrow? I hear funeral sermons and read newspaper obituaries, and study church-yard epitaphs, and I am often surprised at the feebleness of the consolation therein suggested. A delusive spiritualism tells us that our dead friends are hovering about us in invisible forms, sharing still our joys and sorrows; a new theology sets before us the doctrine of a naked immortality, and assures us that the soul has broken from its cage of flesh and blood, and soared away to regions unknown, and is done forever with the encumbrance of a body. But why, we have to ask again and again, does no one speak of "bringing back the King?" This is the one solitary hope of the gospel—the resurrection of the dead at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ in glory. Mark you, I do not questios the present happiness and repose of our blessed dead. They are "absent from the body and present with the Lord." In some sheltered paradise beyond the reach of pain and sorrow "they rest from their labors and their works do follow them." But this is not all. They wait and watch while they rest. The event which Christ is henceforth expecting from His throne in glory; which the church should be watching for during her warfare on earth, the sainted dead are longing for in Paradise—the coming of the Prince of Life, to dethrone the King of Terrors and to swallow up death in victory. A false theology has obscured this hope, and set Christians to looking for death instead of looking for Christ, it has taught them to find the consummation of their happiness in the disembodied state, instead of waiting to be "clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." Thus in sermon and obituary and song, a present spiritual heaven is thrust into the place of a coming resurrection life. It is comparatively a rare thing to read an epitaph like that of the faithful London preacher: "Here lies the body of Charles Haddon Spurgeon, waiting for the appearing of his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." It was a Pauline and Scriptural theology which dictated that inscription. For ask what "words" they are to which the apostle refers when speaking to the bereaved, says, "Wherefore comfort one another with these words;" and then listen to the sublime answer: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we, which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we be ever with the Lord." These are the words divinely appointed for our comfort. Not by a single suggestion would I dim your consolation concerning your departed, that they are enjoying blessed companionship with the Lord. But we should not forget that word of Scripture, "Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." The disembodied state is an imperfect state, it is a state of rest, and not of full fruition; a state of expectancy, and not of complete felicity. "The end of God's ways is glorified corporeity." He will be satisfied with nothing short of a perfect recovery of that which has been lost through sin; a restoration of soul and body sundered by death; a remarrying of the glorified spirit with the glorified flesh, that God may once more gaze upon his perfect image, as he once saw it in an unfallen Paradise. Therefore, let those whose citizenship is on earth crown death, if by a strange infatuation they will do so. But not so with us. "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change this body of humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself." (Phil. 3: 20-21).

If these things be so, let us by all appointed means and by all inspired prayers, help together to bring back our absent King. When sinful men rejected him and sent him from the earth, the Father gave him welcome to his throne saying: "Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool." It is for us now, by making haste to preach the gospel among all nations and so completing his body and bride, the church, to hasten his return, when at the sound of the last trumpet there shall be heard great voices in the heavens saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

SIAM AND THE GOSPEL.

A missionary, writing from Siam during the recent rupture with France, says: "We do not know what the French expect to do next. We do not fear for ourselves, but from the depths of our hearts we pray God to have mercy on this poor nation. We cannot but realize that it is one of the wicked and heathen nations of the world.

"For fifty years the Gospel has been boldly proclaimed here, but though God has a few chosen here he is not acknowledged God; and we know that he has said that the nation that will not serve him, he will utterly destroy."

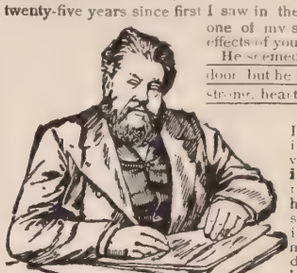
Spurgeon's Own Words.

"DEAR MR. CONGREVE: As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door but he live now, a strong, hearty man.



REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation." "Yours heartily, (Rev.) C. H. SPURGEON, 'WESTWOOD,' Beulah Hill, England."

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

A Battlefield Resurrection.*

THIS joyful ceremony over, the artillery, which had continued to play upon the British batteries, ceased their fire for the guns to cool and the dense smoke to roll off. The whole army crowded to the parapet and looked over into the field. What a scene was gradually disclosed to them! That gorgeous and imposing military array, the two columns of attack, the Highland phalanx, the distant reserve—all had vanished like an apparition. Far away down the plain the glass revealed a faint red line still receding. Nearer to the lines "we could see," says Nolte, "the British troops concealing themselves behind the shrubbery, or throwing themselves into the ditches and gullies. In some of the latter, indeed, they lay so thickly that they were only distinguishable in the distance by the white shoulder-belts, which formed a line along the top of their hiding-place."

Still nearer, the plain was covered and heaped with dead and wounded, as well as with those who had fallen paralyzed by fear alone. "I never had," Jackson would say, "so grand and awful an idea of the resurrection as on that day. After the smoke of the battle had cleared off somewhat I saw in the distance more than five hundred Britons emerging from the heaps of their dead comrades all over the plain, rising up, and still more distinctly visible as the field became clearer, coming forward and surrendering as prisoners of war to our soldiers. They had fallen at our first fire upon them without having received so much as a scratch, and lay prostrate as if dead until the close of the action."

The American army were appalled and silenced at the scene before them. The writhings of the wounded, their shrieks and groans, their convulsive and sudden tossing of limbs, were horrible to see and hear. Seven hundred killed, fourteen hundred wounded, five hundred prisoners, were the result of that twenty-five minutes' work. Jackson's loss was eight killed and thirteen wounded. Two men were killed at the left of the lines, two in the isolated redoubt, and four in the swamp pursuing the skirmishers.

COLLEGE ATHLETICS.†

SO intimate are the relations consisting of the athletic development of the preparatory school and that of the college or university, that neither can be independent of the other. The 'varsity captain looks for his future material among the athletes of the preparatory school, and the school captain studies the manner and method of the 'varsities for suggestions that will enable his team, crew or nine to wrest a victory from his rival school. I have endeavored to give as far as possible the detailed work in each sport, because, from the many inquiries that come from both school and college, it is easy to see that something like practical coaching may be acceptable, even though it be only in print. Of course, the member of the 'varsity will, if he looks through the book, find many things that are to him an old story, but I know that many of us that now have been through the mill, would have read most eagerly a description of how the 'varsity was trained, and when we were school-boys would have saved ourselves many an error by knowing more of the detail observed in such training. Many a man comes to college or enters the upper classes in a preparatory school fresh from home, with no experience of school or college life. Not infrequently such a man has in him a taste for athletics, which has but a small chance of development. He wants to go in for the sports, but hesitates to ask the detail from his fellows lest they think him stupid.

Death of Dhuleep Singh.

The Titled Ruler of the Punjaub and the Original Owner of the Great Koh-i-noor Diamond Dies in Paris.

A CAREER of great vicissitudes has just closed in the French capital. The Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, the titular head of the great Sikh race and the ruler of the Punjaub, died there in the fifty-fifth year of his age. He was the son of the great Runjeet Singh, the Lion of the Punjaub, who was near death when his child was born. He lived long enough, however, to designate his infant boy his heir and successor. But he had several other sons living who were not content to be passed over in favor of the new-born infant. They struggled for the inheritance and for five years the DHULEEP SINGH.

Punjaub was the scene of disorder and bloodshed. Eventually the British interfered and with their help, Dhuleep Singh was proclaimed Maharajah (great king) of the Punjaub and his mother was made regent. No sooner was this woman placed in power, than she began a series of hostile acts against her English neighbors, to whom she and her son were indebted for their exalted positions. The horrors of the great Sikh war will never be forgotten. Treachery and nameless outrages exasperated the English to frenzy and eventually the country was seized and the Sikhs subdued. The Maharajah was then a boy only eleven years old. To leave the country under his control, guided by his treacherous mother, was to invite a repetition of the outrages and further bloodshed. Dhuleep was therefore sent to England to be educated and the affairs of the Punjaub were administered by a British Governor in the name of the Maharajah.

The young potentate won golden opinions in England by his devotion to study and his brilliant talents. He embraced Christianity, declaring that he did so from conviction, and for a time he led an exemplary life. He formed many high connections in England and seemed happy there. Meanwhile, the Punjaub enjoyed a period of quiet and prosperity to which it had long been a stranger. Eventually an agreement was made with the young Maharajah that he should receive a pension of $200,000 a year from the English Government and should in return renounce for himself and his heirs all claim on the Punjaub. From that time he commenced a life of dissipation which even his large income was insufficient to support. He became involved in enormous indebtedness and applied to the British Government for an increase of pension. He was bitterly annoyed and denounced them roundly. He renounced Christianity and tried to make his way back to the Punjaub and organize his people in an attempt to oust the British and restore him to the throne. He was prevented entering the Punjaub and he then went to Russia and offered his services to the Czar if he would undertake a war against England in India. Russia refused his application and he then settled in Paris where, on his expressing regret for his conduct, his pension was resumed. There he remained until his death. Dhuleep Singh was the owner of the famous Koh-i-noor diamond, which he presented to Queen Victoria and she now has it set in her crown.

• • • AGGRESSIVE EVANGELISM.

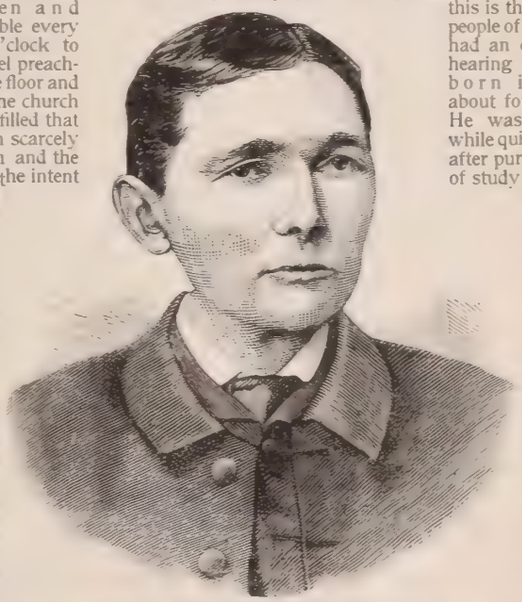
The Gospel Campaign in New York and Brooklyn Inaugurated by Rev. A. C. Dixon and Conducted by Evangelist R. G. Pearson and Major D. W. Whittle.

Entrance to John St. M. E. Church.

THE aggressive Christian movement initiated by Rev. A. C. Dixon in Brooklyn and New York a few weeks ago, as mentioned in our news columns at the time, has steadily grown in depth and power. There has been little excitement, but the work of grace has been very real. The simple Gospel has been preached with pointed personal application, and God has blessed the effort. In the Hanson Place Church, Brooklyn, of which Mr. Dixon is pastor, there has been a most impressive scene witnessed every evening. Men and women of all ages and conditions have earnestly sought the Saviour; and the intense eagerness to listen to the Gospel, which has been manifested since the meetings commenced, is an augury of a large ingathering of souls in the near future.

The time for such a campaign was well chosen. The world, with its business and pleasures, is not so bright to many people as it was a year or two ago. Thousands in the two cities have found that its prizes are illusory and that disappointments, losses and trials await those who live only for temporal things. In such times, the invitation of the Man of Sorrows, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy-laden and I will give you rest" falls upon ears prepared to respond to it. The sure promises of God and the eternal verities of the Gospel attract multitudes who have learned by sad experience the emptinesss of the things of time and sense. There was, also, an unusual opportunity for presenting the truth in vivid, forcible shape to the people. The evangelists whom Mr. Moody had gathered around him in Chicago were separating to go to their respective homes. They were fresh from contact with Mr. Moody's magnetic enthusiasm, and they had witnessed, during the marvellous Chicago campaign, some wonderful triumphs of the Holy Spirit's power over scepticism, ignorance and indifference. Mr. Dixon's invitation to some of them to come and labor in the Metropolitan cities was cordially accepted and they have brought their fresh and attractive methods of sowing the Gospel seed into this most difficult and discouraging field. The results have fully justified the hopes entertained of the effort. Among the numbers who have joyfully confessed Christ and declared their saving faith in him, are some who have lived practically heathen lives in the midst of Gospel privileges; but by far the larger number belong to the class hardest of all to move—those who are familiar with the Gospel, have heard it declared time and time again by eloquent lips, yet had previously resisted all appeals to come out from the world and ally themselves to Christ and his people.

As a rule, they have been thoughtful, sensible people, not of the emotional kind, but of the class which furnishes the most useful and devoted members of our churches, men who once convinced, take their stand and hold fast to the end. The preaching of Major Whittle and Evangelist Pearson, the two leaders who up to this time have conducted the work, is specially adapted to move this class. Their sermons appeal, not as much to the emotions, as to the sober common sense of their hearers, convicting and convincing and teaching with singular cogency and penetrating power. In the mid-day meetings in the Old John St. M. E. Church in New York, the evangelists have had the assistance and support of Mr. Yatman, Mr. Thomas Harriman and other experienced workers, who have heartily co-operated in the delightful work and rejoiced in the manifest tokens of divine blessings. Within the hallowed walls of the old building, where in bygone years there have been so many glorious manifestations of the Holy Spirit's power, crowds of lawyers, business men and clerks assemble every day at one o'clock to hear the Gospel preached. Often, the floor and galleries of the church have been so filled that there has been scarcely standing room and the solemn hush, the intent gaze and the subdued sob, or whispered prayer, from some penitent soul showed how profound was the impression produced. If the souls of Philip Embury, Barbara Heck and the other old-time worthies, whose memorial tablets adorn the walls of the old sanctuary can see what is taking place there, day by day, a new note of thankfulness must be added to the song with which they praise Him whom they served on earth and now see face to face.



REV. R. G. PEARSON.
The Eloquent Southern Evangelist now Labouring in New York.

In the conduct of these meetings a prominent part has been taken by Evangelist R. G. Pearson, whose portrait appears on this page. Although well known in the South, this is the first time the people of the north have had an opportunity of hearing him. He was born in Mississippi about forty years ago. He was converted while quite young, and, after pursuing a course of study at the Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., was graduated from that institution and ordained as a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In 1878 he was married to a most estimable Christian lady, who has proved a true help-meet to him in his work. He continued in the pastorate for several years, and at one time was associate pastor of the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of Nashville, Tenn. Ten years ago, after much prayer, Mr. Pearson decided to devote his whole time to evangelistic work. At first his energies were devoted to denominational revival work, but as invitations were received from other denominations union meetings were held and now he has permission from his presbytery to engage in general evangelistic work wherever the providence of God may lead him. During his evangelistic career he has been fully occupied and often has had more invitations than he could accept. He objects on principle to the ordinary mode of engagement and has always refused to stipulate for definite remuneration in entering upon an engagement. He has held meetings in every Southern state, and nearly all the large cities of the South. God has wonderfully owned his efforts for the salvation of souls, and the number of persons who have been converted in various cities have ranged from 300 to 1000. These ingatherings have proved permanent additions to the churches. In several places where union

SCENE IN OLD JOHN STREET M. E. CHURCH DURING EVANGELIST PEARSON'S SERVICES.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

A HUNTING SCENE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Genesis 49: 27: "In the morning he shall devour the prey and at night he shall divide the spoil."

A FEW nights ago eight hundred men encamped along the Long Island Railroad so as to be ready for the next morning which was the first "open day" for deer-hunting. Between sunrise and two o'clock in the afternoon of that day fifteen deer were shot. On the 20th of October our woods and forests resound with a shock of fire-arms, and are tracked of pointers and setters, because the quail are then a lawful prize for the sportsman. On a certain day in all England you can hear the crack of the sportsman's gun, because grouse hunting has begun; and every man that can afford the time and ammunition, and can draw a bead, starts for the fields. Xenophon grew eloquent in regard to the art of hunting. In the far East, people, elephant-mounted, chase the tiger. The American Indian darts his arrow at the buffalo until the frightened herd tumble over the rocks. European nobles are often found in the fox-chase and at the stag-hunt. Francis I. was called the father of hunting. Moses declares of Nimrod: "He was a mighty hunter before the Lord." Therefore, in all ages of the world, the imagery of my text ought to be suggestive, whether it means a wolf after a fox, or a man after a lion. Old Jacob, dying, is telling the fortunes of his children. He prophesies the devouring propensities of Benjamin and his descendants. With his dim old eyes he looks off and sees the hunters going out to the fields, ranging them all day, and at nightfall coming home, the game slung over the shoulder and reaching the door of the tent, the hunters begin to distribute the game, and one takes a coney, and another a rabbit, and another a roe. "In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." Or it may be a reference to the habits of wild beasts that slay their prey, and then drag it back to the cave or lair, and divide it among the young.

I take my text, in the first place, as descriptive of those people who in the morning of their life give themselves up to hunting the world, but afterward, by the grace of God, in the evening of their life divide among themselves the spoils of Christian character. There are aged Christian men and women in this house who, if they gave testimony, would tell you that in the morning of their life they were after the world as intense as a hound after a hare, or as a falcon swoops upon a gazelle. They wanted the world's plaudits and the world's gains. They felt that if they could get this world they would have everything. Some of them started out for the pleasures of the world. They thought that the man who laughed loudest was happiest. They tried repartee, and conundrum, and burlesque, and madrigal. They thought they would like to be Tom Hoods, or Charles Lambs, or Edgar A. Poes. They mingled wine, and music, and the spectacular. They were worshippers of the harlequin, and the Merry Andrew, and the buffoon, and the jester. Life was to them foam, and bubble, and cachinnation, and roystering, and grimace. They were so full of glee they could hardly repress their mirth, even on solemn occasions, and they came near bursting out hilariously even at the burial, because there was something so dolorous in the tone or countenance of the undertaker. After awhile, misfortune struck them hard on the back. They found there was something they could not laugh at. Under their late hours their health gave way, or there was a death in the house. Of every green thing their soul was exfoliated. They found out that life was more than a joke. From the heart of God there blazed into their soul an earnestness they had never felt before. They awoke to their sinfulness and their immortality, and here they sit at sixty or seventy years of age, as appreciative of all innocent mirth as they ever were, but they are bent on a style of satisfaction which in early life they never hunted; the evening of their days brighter than the morning. In the morning they devoured the prey, but at night they divided the spoils.

Then there are others who started out for financial success. They see how limber the rim of a man's hat is when he bows down before some one transpicuous. They felt they would like to see how the world looked from the window of a four thousand dollar turn-out. They thought they would like to have the morning sunlight tangled in the head-gear of a dashing span. They wanted the bridges in the park to resound under the rataplan of their swift hoofs. They wanted a gilded baldrick, and so they started on the dollar hunt. They chased it up one street and chased it down another. They followed it when it burrowed in the cellar. They treed it in the roof. Wherever a dollar was expected to be, they were. They chased it across the ocean. They chased it across the land. They stopped not for the night. Hearing that dollar, even in the darkness, thrilled them as an Adirondack sportsman is thrilled at midnight by a loon's laugh. They chased that dollar to the money-vault. They chased it to the government treasury. They routed it from under the counter. All the hounds were out—all the pointers and the setters. They leaped the hedges for that dollar, and they cried: "Hark away! a dollar! a dollar!" And when at last they came upon it and had actually captured it, their excitement was like that of a falconer who has successfully flung his first hawk. In the morning of their life, oh, how they devoured the prey! But there came a better time to their soul. They found out that an immortal nature cannot live on bank stock. They took up a Northern Pacific bond, and there was a hole in it through which they could look into the uncertainty of all earthly treasures. They saw some Ralston, living at the rate of twenty-five thousand dollars a month, leaping from San Francisco wharf because he could not continue to live at the same ratio. They saw the wizen and paralytic bankers who had changed their souls into molten gold stamped with the image of the earth, earthy. They saw some great souls by avarice turned into homunculi, and they said to themselves: "I will seek after higher treasure."

From that time they did not care whether they walked or rode, if Christ walked with them; nor whether they lived in a mansion or in a hut, if they dwelt under the shadow of the Almighty; nor whether they were robed in French broadcloth or in homespun, if they had the robe of the Saviour's righteousness; nor if they were sandalled with morocco or calf-skin, if they were shod with the preparation of the Gospel. Now you see peace on their countenance. Now that man says: "What a fool I was to be enchanted with this world. Why, I have more satisfaction in five minutes in the service of God than I had in all the first years of my life while I was gain getting. I like this evening of my day a great deal better than I did the morning. In the morning I greedily devoured the prey; but now it is evening, and I am gloriously dividing the spoil."

My friends, this world is a poor thing to hunt. It is healthful to go out in the woods and hunt. It rekindles the lustre of the eye. It strikes the brown of the autumnal leaf into the cheek. It gives to the rheumatic limbs the strength to leap like a roe. Christopher North's pet gun, the muckle-mou'd-Meg, going off in the summer in the forests, had its echo in the winter-time in the eloquence that rang through the university halls of Edinburgh. It is healthy to go hunting in the fields; but I tell you that it is belittling and bedwarfing and belaming for a man to hunt this world. The hammer comes down on the gun-cap, and the barrel explodes and kills you instead of that which you are pursuing. When you turn out to hunt the world, the world turns out to hunt you; and as many a sportsman aiming his gun at a panther's heart has gone down under the striped claws, so, while you have been attempting to devour this world, the world has been devouring you. So it was with Lord Byron. So it was with Coleridge. So it was with Catherine of Russia. Henry II. went out hunting for this world, and its lances struck through his heart. Francis I. aimed at the world, but the assassin's dagger put an end to his ambition and his life with one stroke. Mary Queen of Scots wrote on the window of her castle:

> From the top of all my trust
> Mishap hath laid me in the dust.

The Queen Dowager of Navarre was offered for her wedding day a costly and beautiful pair of gloves, and she put them on; but they were poisoned gloves, and they took her life. Better a bare hand of cold privation than a warm and poisoned glove of ruinous success. "Oh," says some young man in the audience, "I believe what you are preaching. I am going to do that very thing. In the morning of my life I am going to devour the prey, and in the evening I shall divide the spoils of Christian character. I only want a little while to sow my wild oats, and then I will be good." Young man, did you ever take the census of all the old people? How many old people are there in your house? One, two, or none? How many in a vast assemblage like this? Only here and there a gray head, like the patches of snow here and there in the fields on a late April day. The fact is that the tides of the years are so strong, that men go down under them before they get to be sixty, before they get to be fifty, before they get to be forty, before they get to be thirty; and if you, my young brother, resolve now that you will spend the morning of your days in devouring the prey, the probability is that you will never divide the spoils in the evening hour. He who postpones until old age the religion of Jesus Christ, postpones it forever. Where are the men who, thirty years ago, resolved to become Christians in old age, putting it off a certain number of years? They never got to be old. The railroad collision, or the steam-boat explosion, or the slip on the ice, or the falling ladder, or the sudden cold put an end to their opportunities. They have never had an opportunity since, and never will have an opportunity again. They locked the door of heaven against their soul, and they threw away the keys. They chased the world, and they died in the chase. The wounded tiger turned on them. They failed to take the game they pursued. Mounted on a swift courser, they leaped the hedge, but the courser fell on them and crushed them. Proposing to barter their soul for the world, they lost both and got neither.

While this is an encouragement to old people who are still unpardoned, it is no encouragement to the young who are putting off the day of grace. This doctrine that the old may be repentant is to be taken cautiously. It is medicine that kills or cures. The same medicine, given to different patients, in one case it saves life, and in the other it destroys it. This possibility of repentance at the close of life may cure the old man while it kills the young. Be cautious in taking it.

Again: my subject is descriptive of those who come to a sudden and a radical change. You have noticed how short a time it is from morning to night—only seven or eight hours. You know that the day has a very brief life. Its heart beats twenty-four times, and then it is dead. How quick this transition in the character of these Benjamites! "In the morning they shall devour the prey, and at night they shall divide the spoils." Is it possible that there shall be such a transformation in any of our characters? Yes, a man may be at seven o'clock in the morning an all-devouring worldling, and at seven o'clock at night he may be a peaceful, distributive Christian. Conversion is instantaneous. A man passes into the kingdom of God quicker than down the sky runs zig-zag lightning. A man may be anxious about his soul for a great many years; that does not make him a Christian. A man may pray a great while; that does not make him a Christian. A man may resolve on the reformation of his character, and have that resolution going on a great while; that does not make him a Christian. But the very instant when he flings his soul on the mercy of Jesus Christ, that instant is lustration, emancipation, resurrection. Up to that point he is going in the wrong direction; after that point he is going in the right direction. Before that moment he is a child of sin; after that moment he is a child of God. Before that moment devouring the prey; after that moment dividing the spoil. Five minutes is as good as five years. My hearer, you know very well that the best things you have done you have done in a flash. You made up your mind in an instant to buy, or to sell, or to invest, or to stop, or to start. If you had missed that one chance, you would have missed it forever. Now just as precipitate, and quick, and spontaneous will be the ransom of your soul. Some morning you were making a calculation. You got on the track of some financial or social game. With your pen or pencil you were pursuing it. That very morning you were devouring the prey; but that very night you were in a different mood. You found that all heaven was offered you. You wondered how you could get it for yourself and for your family. You wondered what resources it would give you now and hereafter. You are dividing peace, and comfort, and satisfaction, and Christian reward in your soul. You are dividing the spoil.

One Sabbath night, at the close of the service, I said to some persons: "When did you first become serious about your soul?" And they told me: "To-night." And I said to others: "When did you give your heart to God?" And they said: "To-night." And I said to still others: "When did you resolve to serve the Lord all the days of your life?" And they said: "To-night." I saw by the gayety of their apparel that when the grace of God struck them they were devouring the prey; but I saw also, in the flood of joyful tears, and in the kindling raptures on their brow, and in their exhilarant and transporting utterances, that they were dividing the spoil. If you have been in this building when the lights are struck at night, you know that with one touch of electricity they are all blazed. Oh, I would to God that the darkness of your souls might be broken up, and that by one quick, overwhelming, instantaneous flash of illumination, you might be brought into the light and the liberty of the sons of God!

You see that religion is a different thing from what some of you people supposed. You thought it was decadence; you thought religion was maceration; you thought it was highway robbery; that it struck one down and left him half dead; that it plucked out the eyes; that it plucked out the plumes of the soul; that it broke the wing and crushed he beak as it came clawing with its black alons through the air. No, that is not religion. What is religion? It is dividing the poils. It is taking a defenceless soul and anoplying it for eternal conquest. It is the istribution of prizes by the king's hand, very medal stamped with a coronation. It s an exhilaration, an expansion. It is imaradisation. It is enthronement. Religion akes a man master of earth, of death, and ell. It goes forth to gather the medals of ictory won by Prince Emanuel, and the iadems of heaven, and the glories of realms errestrial, and celestial, and then, after rangng all worlds for everything that is resplenent, it divides the spoil. What was it that ames Turner, the famous English evangest was doing when in his dying moments e said: "Christ is all! Christ is all!" Vhy, he was entering into light; he was ounding the Cape of Good Hope; he was ividing the spoil. What was the aged Christian Quakeress doing when at eighty ears of age she arose in the meeting one ay and said: "The time of my departure s come. My grave clothes are falling off?" She was dividing the spoil.

She longed with wings to fly away,
And mix with that eternal day.

What is Daniel now doing, the lion tamer? nd Elijah who was drawn by the flaming oursers? and Paul, the rattling of whose hains made kings quake? and all the other ictims of flood, and fire, and wreck, and guillotine—where are they? Dividing the spoil.

Ten thousand times ten thousand,
In sparkling raiment bright,
The armies of the ransomed saints
Throng up the steeps of light.

'Tis finished, all is finished,
Their fight with death and sin;
Lift high your golden gates,
And let the victors in.

Oh, what a grand thing it is to be a Christian! We begin now to divide the spoil, but the distribution will not be completed to all eternity. There is a poverty-struck soul, there is a business-despoiled soul, there is a sin-struck soul, there is a bereaved soul—why do you not come and get the spoils of Christian character, the comfort, the joy, the peace, the salvation that I am sent to offer you in my Master's name? Though your knees knock together in weakness, though your hand tremble in fear, though your eyes rain tears of uncontrollable weeping—come and get the spoils. Rest for all the weary. Pardon for all the guilty. Labor for all the bestormed. Life for all the dead. I verily believe that there are some who have come in here, downcast because the world is against them, and because they feel God is against them, who will go away saying:

I came to Jesus as I was,
Weary and worn and sad;
I found in him a resting-place,
And he has made me glad.

Though you came in children of the world, you may go away heirs of heaven. Though this very autumnal morning you were devouring the prey, now, all worlds witnessing, you may divide the spoil.

NOT THE MIRROR'S FAULT.

In a box of articles sent to an African mission station were a number of small hand-mirrors. These took the people's fancy, and their fame was carried far beyond the station. The knowledge of this wonderful thing came to a princess of a distant tribe. She had never beheld her dusky countenance, except in a placid lake, and she longed to behold all her charms, for being a princess, she was told by everybody that she was most beautiful, whereas she was one of the plainest women in the whole tribe. She sent for one of these mirrors, and when she got possession of it she took herself off to her own place, that she might have a good long look at her beauty. When she beheld herself as she was, she was so disgusted with her plainness that with one blow of her royal hand she dashed the glass to pieces. She ordered the missionaries off her territory, and published an edict forbidding looking-glasses being brought into the country. Perhaps a similar cause may account for the opposition of some people to the Bible. It shows them how sinful and wicked they are.

His Work for Christ Ended.

Rev. Charles F. Deems of New York and His Long Career of Usefulness in the Church of the Strangers.

FEW churches in New York are better known than the Church of the Strangers and the name of Rev. Charles F. Deems, its pastor, is familiar throughout the nation. Six months ago, Dr. Deems suffered a paralytic stroke from which he never recovered. On Saturday, Nov. 18, the close of his long Christian life came and the faithful servant of God entered into the reward of his labors. Dr. Deems was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1820, his father being a Methodist clergyman. Converted while still a mere boy, he chose the ministerial profession, and at fifteen years of age was sent to Dickinson College, Pa., where he graduated in 1836. Two years later, the young student, now twenty-one, was appointed Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in the University of North Carolina, which position he occupied for five years, afterwards becoming Professor of Natural Science in Randolph Macon College, Va. In 1860 Dr. Deems visited Europe for six months, and on his return organized a school in Wilson county, N. C. During the five years previous to 1865, he was Presiding Elder of the Wilmington and Newbern District in that State.

Full of the desire to work for the Lord in a broader field, he came to New York, and with the assistance of friends, hired a small chapel temporarily, where he began to preach. His first sermon on July 22d, 1866, was preached to an audience of fifteen persons; but so marked were his ability and earnestness, that he soon became widely known. His audiences were composed of many persons of different denominations, and from this fact, the name of "The Strangers' Home" was adopted. Declining many tempting offers from colleges and other quarters, he stuck to his work on the lines he had laid out, and soon found himself with a large flock, but still without a regular church organization.

THE LATE CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D.

In January 1868, thirty-two persons enrolled themselves under his ministry, and then was organized the "Church of the Strangers." Every year augmented the membership of the new church, and almost every Protestant denomination was represented on its rolls. Still, there were many difficulties; but as the work expanded, the courageous and devoted pastor found encouragement in his efforts. In 1869, the old "Commodore," Cornelius Vanderbilt, who had attended the services frequently, purchased the Mercer St. Presbyterian Church and generously presented it to Dr. Deems for the use of the congregation. This munificent gift came at a time when it was doubly valuable, and at once put the church on a substantial footing. Dr. Deems' acquaintance with Commodore Vanderbilt had begun in 1866, when he was living and preaching in Mobile, Ala. A Southern lady, who afterward became the wife of the Commodore, attended these services, and it was largely through her influence that Mr. Vanderbilt, several years later, was moved to interest himself personally in the organization of the new church in New York.

In his book, entitled, A Romance of Providence, Dr. Deems tells how the Commodore catechised him carefully about his preaching, past history and expectations for the future. Fifty thousand dollars were needed at that moment for the purchase of the Mercer street property, and towards this large sum, the clergyman had just eighty cents! The old Commodore extracted this confession from him. The pastor had resolved never to appeal for the money, believing that if God wanted him to stay in New York and do the work to which his heart inclined, the money would come. Looking him straight in the eye, Mr. Vanderbilt said:

"I will give you the church."

"Commodore Vanderbilt, you don't know me," said the clergyman; "there is not any man in America rich enough to have me for a chaplain."

The railroad king, who was accustomed to be solicited for money, was astonished to find one man who could refuse $50,000.

"Me have a chaplain!" he cried, "the Lord knows I have got as little use for a chaplain as any one man you ever saw. I want to give you this church and give it to you only. Now, will you take it?"

"Commodore," replied Dr. Deems, extending his hand, "if you give me that church for the Lord Jesus Christ, I will most thankfully accept it," and upon that basis the gift was received.

The great trust thus imposed was most faithfully kept. The opening services of the Church of the Strangers occupied several days and many eminent divines took part, including Rev. Drs. Moran, from North Carolina, Munsey of Baltimore, Bacon of New Haven, Marshall, DeWitt, Prentiss, Booth, Schaff, Armitage, Prime, Mingins, and others. The Church became an Evangelical land-mark in New York. In all departments of Christian work it has thriven, and the ministry of Dr. Deems under God's blessing, was made the means of bringing many souls to Christ. In addition to his regular pastoral duties, Dr. Deems found time for considerable literary work. The Home Altar, What Now, Weights and Wings, and many other volumes of a religious character from his pen, have been helpful to thousands of readers in leading them to the new life.

Dr. Deems' greatest ambition was to die in harness. He endeavored, during his whole career, to follow the leading of Providence, and his history shows that his trust in the Divine Master was abundantly justified. The portrait of the distinguished clergyman given on this page is from a photograph by Davis Garber, 747 Broadway, N. Y., the very last ever taken before Dr. Deems' fatal attack.

The funeral services, which were conducted by Rev. H. M. Hodson, who has lately been supplying the pulpit in the "Church of the Strangers," was very largely attended, and Cornelius Vanderbilt was one of the pall-bearers. The remains were interred in the old Moravian Cemetery at New Dorp, Staten Island, in a plot which the late Commodore Vanderbilt gave to Dr. Deems twenty years ago.

AGGRESSIVE EVANGELISM.

meetings have been held, business houses, banks, and saloons have voluntarily closed, and sometimes the courts have adjourned so as to afford the employes an opportunity to listen to Mr. Pearson's presentation of the gospel. In some Southern cities the services have been held in the "cotton compresses," as the large cotton warehouses are called. These vast buildings will seat in many instances 4000 people, and nightly have they been crowded for weeks together, the only attraction being the preaching of the gospel by Mr. Pearson.

An incident which occurred at Rock Hill, S. C., will be long remembered in that locality. Mr. Pearson had been holding services for several days in a large tent, and the audiences had grown from day to day until they numbered between two and three thousand persons. The work was still growing when a circus visited the town, and there were many predictions that the counter-attraction would draw off all the evangelist's hearers. The circus people made a parade and fixed the hour for the first performance at the same time as the Gospel service. To the astonishment of all and the disgust of the circus people, the attendance at the circus was a meagre three hundred persons, while the Gospel tent was crowded as usual. The Gospel had evidently taken a stronger hold on the people than had been realized, and the circus people were not slow to appreciate the fact. They pulled up stakes the same night and departed.

During the World's Fair Campaign Mr. Moody sent for Mr. Pearson to be one of his co-workers. He was led to do this, as the result of his travels in the South, where, as he himself stated in the Haymarket in Chicago, he had continually come across Mr. Pearson's lasting foot-prints in Y. M. C. A. halls and Gospel missions erected as a result of his work. "I heard of Evangelist Pearson everywhere," said Mr. Moody, "but against him not one word either personally or as to his methods, but found him held in loving memory in every place he had visited, even after the lapse of years." Mr. Pearson is the author of a book entitled "Truth Applied," which passed through three editions in ninety days, and has had a large sale in the South and Southwest, and has been adopted by one theological seminary as a text book on practical preaching. As to his present work at the Hanson Place Baptist Church of Brooklyn, Paster A. C. Dixon says, "I have been in many revivals, but never in one which began with so many conversions. Verily the hand of the Lord is upon this preacher of his Word."

CROSS-BEARERS' READING CIRCLE.

Christians should be able to speak and pray intelligently concerning the missionary work in China, India, Africa and the whole world. Such missionary leaders as Brainerd, Carey, Morrison, Martyn and Mackay should be as familiar to Christians as the names of Washington and Grant. Many people perhaps have been wondering where they might find a comprehensive missionary reading course that would cover all fields. The Cross-Bearers' Missionary Reading Circle offers just such a course. It is modeled on the plan of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. The course extends over three years and includes missionary history, biography, travel, philosophy, and current missionary literature. The reading requires one-half hour per day. At the end of each year examinations are given. The students are allowed reference to their books in examination, it being the intention that the main benefit shall be derived from the reading rather than from the examinations. Upon completion of the three years' course, certificates of graduation are given. The movement during its two years of existence has grown rapidly wherever it is known and it is heartily endorsed by leading men of all denominations. The regular course for 1893 and 1894 is a feast of good things. It is as follows: Autobiographical—"My Missionary Apprenticeship," Bishop J. M. Thoburn; "The Story of John G. Paton." Theological—"Doomed Religions," Rev. J. M. Reid, D. D. Prophetical—"The New Era," Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D. Periodical—"The Missionary Review of the World." The Secretary Rev. Z. M. Williams, St. Josephs, Missouri, will gladly furnish full information to all interested in the course.

THE HEAVENLY INHERITANCE.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 10. I. Peter 1: 1-12. Golden Text, Col. 1:12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Epistles of Paul are all addressed to the churches or to the individuals to whom he writes. That of the Apostle James is addressed to "the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion," while Peter writes to a smaller company, "to the elect, who are sojourners of the Dispersion," . . . according to the foreknowledge of God the Father unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." What then, were they strangers to the blood of Jesus? This could not be, for he appeals to them to be holy on the very ground of their redemption: "Like as he which hath called you is holy, be ye yourselves also holy in all manner of living. . . . And if ye call on him as Father . . . pass the time of your sojourning here in fear . . . knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, with silver and gold, from your vain manner of life handed down from your fathers, but with precious blood, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ."

But, in the foreknowledge of God, there are children of his who in sanctification of the Spirit are chosen, "elect unto obedience," whose meat and drink it is to do the will of God,"

Children of Obedience, who know the continual sprinkling of the blood of Christ, the cleansing, continually going on, in deeper and deeper depths of their being. These are his true Levites, who have no part nor inheritance among their brethren; the Lord is their portion and their inheritance; they ask, they desire no other. Once Peter said: "We have left all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore!" Now he asks this question no more; he is satisfied, he has found his citizenship in heaven, he looks for nothing more on earth, he is what he calls others to be—a pilgrim and a stranger upon earth, his eyes are fixed on things which are above, from whence he looks for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his agony, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." The apostle puts into a few words a vast truth, and brings it down to practical life. Blesssed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy begat us again unto a living hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." God is a God of eternity; he begets children with hopes which are eternal has its anchor in Christ's conquest of death! God's elect are generated unto this living hope, it cannot be put on or adopted, it is part of the eternal life which God gave him authority to give to those whom the Father has given to him. And the proof whether a child of God has this hope in time is that "he purifieth himself anew as he is pure (I. John 3:3); it is the instinct of this life of God within him that he cannot suffer, cannot tolerate anything in him which is not like Christ; he is "elect unto obedience and sprinkling." Such a one never justifies himself, he purifies himself, it is never his object to appear right but to be pure before his eyes which are as a flame of fire. Because he is called to an inheritance which is incorruptible, all which is corruptible, all which is of the flesh, and of his own self-life becomes intolerable to him, he has seen the Lord, and all which is not like him is dust and ashes. All which has within it the elements of corruption has lost its charm for him, he has seen from afar the glory of the incorruptible, and all his heart has gone before him into the land of his inheritance. The old desire he had to be appreciated and understood, the old pain that he could not fill a larger sphere, be more recognized as useful and necessary, the old gratification in the consciousness of being of use—all these corruptible things have lost their power; like John the Baptist, he says with a joy which has reached its fulness, "He must increase, but I must decrease," (John 3:31), and the elements of incorruption, the breath of the world where all adore our God, is in these few but pregnant words.

Begotten again unto an inheritance! It is a birthright, not a gift, it is that which the life of God within entitles to. "Heirs of God. and joint heirs with Christ," is no figure of speech. An inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time. What is this? Salvation from everlasting punishment or death is known to us from the moment we believe; this is already revealed. What then is the in the last time?" Paul, writing to the Romans, speaks of an "earnest expectation" of the whole creation which groans and travails in pain, and he adds: "We ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. "And in connection with this he says: "For by hope were we saved, but hope that is seen is not hope, for who hopeth for that which he seeth? But if we hope for that which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it. We do see and possess salvation from condemnation and from sin. Is not then "the redemption of our body the salvation ready to be revealed in the last time; when "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump? Is not Christ's final conquest of death, "the last enemy," the real pledge to us of the incorruptible, the undefiled, that which fadeth not away? and is not therefore the coming of our Lord the one living hope on which our expectations are to be centred?

There are many children of God whose anticipation in looking forward to a heavenly inheritance is a purely personal one; they do not see how sin and death, with all their accompaniments of misery, shame, sorrow, sickness which touch all mankind, can only be conquered when the Master comes. It is not, for such as understood the Master, a question of "What shall I have therefore?" but rather our intense cry, coming out of the consciousness of how terribly degenerate is the Christianity of the day; "Hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; Thy will be done." When once the Daystar has arisen in the heart of one of God's children, and he not only has turned to God from idols to serve the living and the true God, but also to wait for his Son from heaven, he begins to understand, as never before, how really God himself, and not some mere state of enjoyment, is their inheritance.

"Wherein ye greatly rejoice." When the servant enters into the joy of his Lord, when his joy is in us, then our joy is full. A joy which seeks its own gratification is corruptible, it is never full, but a joy which asks nothing for itself, but only that he, the Lord, may have his way, can be full even in the midst of trial. "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a while, if need be, ye have been put to grief by manifold temptations, [or trials] that the proof of your faith, being more precious than of gold that perisheth though it is proved by fire, might be found unto praise and glory, and honor,

At the Revelation of Jesus Christ."

O how much the holy men whom God used to write the New Testament looked forward to the revelation of Jesus Christ! It was always the goal to which they looked; their service was in view of this; they could suspend all judgment until he comes; in their eyes it was the motive for real purification and sanctification. When he shall be revealed we shall see him, and shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is, but it is only the anointed eyes that ever can see him as he is, and only such as do thus see him shall be "like him." "They beholding as in a glass the glory of God are changed into the same image from glory to glory. Those who do not study the glass of God's Word, but study other men and their own experiences, do not become like him; they do not see him as he is. But it is just those who, by the grace of God, have their eyes thus opened that are also the most tried. But God never wastes his dispensations. There is a special aid in view in everything which tries his chosen ones. "That the proof of your faith." All real faith is put to the proof. Just as every bridge which is built must be put to a strain, and every steam engine, every gun must be proved before it can be passed and guaranteed, so every child of God must be proved before God can guarantee him.

AN ORIENTAL REFINER.

A Message of hope and consolation to a people, in sore need of both, is this first epistle of Peter. It was written about the year 67 when Nero was devastating the Church of Christ; and his representatives in all the provinces of the empire were following the imperial example. Farrar thinks it almost certain that Peter was in Rome when he wrote the epistle. Peter dates it from Babylon, but Rome was spoken of under the title of Babylon by John in the Revelation, and Peter may have used that name as a matter of precaution. There was at this time, however, a colony of Jews living among the ruins of ancient Babylon, and it is possible that Peter wrote from there. A special importance attaches to the epistle, because the evidence that it was really the work of Peter is conclusive, and we have an opportunity in reading it of seeing what he thought of Christianity thirty-three or thirty-four years after the death of Christ. It must have been strongly reassuring to these Christians, belonging to the churches Paul had founded, who had heard Paul disparaged as one who had never seen the Lord and might be in error, to read Peter's endorsement of the Gospel Paul had preached to them, and his exhortations to remain firm in it. The verses on which the lesson for the day is based, form the key-note to the epistle. Peter cheers and encourages the Christians under persecution. He bids them remember their exalted privileges. They knew things that the angels desired to look into, and which the prophets had searched for diligently, when they were writing things they did not understand. He tells them that they are kept, or as the Revised Version has it, guarded, by the power of God; that this trial of their faith is more precious in the sight of God than gold, which will eventually perish, though it has resisted even fire. Finally he points them to their reward, an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled that will never pass away. Peter's conception of Christianity is not of a system of ceremonies, nor even as a system of doctrines, but as a living hope. It is not a dead hope with no power in the soul, but an active, vigorous hope, supporting men under trial and persecution. It is a hope on which they may live and endure trial and suffering. With such a living hope in their hearts they may patiently and cheerfully bear their many present afflictions and hold out to the end. Such is Peter's message, and it must have been welcome to those whom he addressed, as it has been to many since that time.

An inheritance . . . that fadeth not away. The phenomenon of a mirage has often been described. The traveller in the desert oppressed by the monotony of sand and sky and suffering thirst, suddenly sees in the distance a lake surrounded by shade trees. He pres ses forward gladly to reach the place but h never reaches it. It does not exist save it the atmospheric conditions and it soon fade away. "From a certain village in Illinois," says a Chicago journal, "a city was see apparently elevated above all intervening ob jects, and near at hand. Even small object in its various streets could be distinctly ob served. Some spectators recognized it a a city about twelve miles distant; other thought it was some other city, but every one knew it was only a reflection. In a few moments the mirage dissolved in air, an nothing remained." At present, worldly peo ple believe that the Christian whose treasur is in heaven is trusting in a city like that but the time is coming when it will be foun that the heavenly city is the one that fadet not away and the worldly cities have van ished like the mirage.

The trial of your faith. It is the storms an tempests and troubles of life that try th faith. If a man suffers loss and still believe in God and loves and praises him, there i no doubt of his faith being real and strong but if he begins to doubt, when troubl comes upon him and gives up his confidence we may be sure that long before the tria came, his faith was feeble. Travellers tell u of a tree in tropical countries the inner part of which are sometimes eaten out by ants while the bark and leaves remain apparently as fresh as ever; and it is not until the tor nado comes and sweeps it down that its weakness is discovered. But the storm did not make the tree weak; it only revealed how weak it was, and its feebleness was the result of the gnawing of insects through a long course of time. In a like manner, if we let our characters be honeycombed by constant neglect of common duty, or by daily indulgence in secret sin, or by habitual yielding to some temptation, we cannot expect anything else than ruin when the testing hour shall come.

More precious than gold. We are told of one of the late Roman emperors, that when he came to the throne he threatened to dismiss from his service every Christian who would not renounce his faith, and then, from the few men who preferred the dismissal of the emperor to the denial of Christ, he chose his most trusted ministers, and kept them all his life. And God has a process not unlike that in his dealings with us. "I seem," said a preacher, "to hear the edict about you, "We will try him, tempt him, put him in the furnace, thrust him out, as it were, into all temptation, and when he is tried he shall have the crown of life.'"

Whom having not seen ye love. A widow was living with her little girl in France. She was on a visit there when her husband died in Chicago and the shock of hearing of his death prostrated her, and for a time she was so ill that she knew no one and was bereft of reason. She recovered, but was too weak to bear the voyage home. Another trouble came upon her. She believed her husband to have been wealthy, but he had suffered reverses in business of which he had not told her, and when his estate was settled there was nothing left for her support. In the emergency, her unmarried brother wrote her not to worry as he would provide for her and would make her daughter his heiress. The widow was greatly relieved on her daughter's account, but for herself she felt that life was scarcely worth living under the combined troubles. She was weary and dispirited and soon died. Her daughter was in a French school, and her uncle decided that she had better stay there and finish her education. He wrote to her frequently, advising her, encouraging her and sending her money. Her every want was provided for and in her every difficulty she appealed to her uncle and received his help and sympathy. She had never seen him but it is not surprising that she should love him; no man could have been a better friend to her. The Christian has similar but infinitely greater reason for loving his Lord whom one day he will see face to face.

The sufferings and the glories that should follow them. A well-known writer says: Glory is attained only through suffering. When gardeners want to bring a rose to richer flowering, they deprive it for a season of light and moisture. Silent and dark it stands, dropping one fading leaf after another, and seeming to go patiently down to death. But when every leaf is dropped, and the plant stands stripped to the uttermost, a new life is even then working in the buds, from which shall spring a tenderer foliage and a brighter wealth of flowers. So, often in celestial gardening, every leaf of earthly joy must drop before a new and divine bloom visits the soul.

Died for Africa's Sake.

Mrs. Richard's of the Mashonaland Mission Succumbs to Fever at Inhambane.

MITTIE BEBOUT RICHARDS.

RECENT letters from Africa bring the sad intelligence that Mrs. Mittie Bebout Richards, wife of Rev. E. H. Richards, Superintendent of Bishop Taylor's Mashonaland Mission, died of African fever at Inhambane, on Sunday, September 17. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will readily recall Mr. and Mrs. Richards as the missionaries whose explorations and adventures in King Umzila's country were fully described in these columns in April last. In a letter to Dr. S. J. Bebout, of Norwalk, Ct., the only sister of the dead missionary, Mr. Richards gives the affecting details of the sad event. On Sept. 13, he was taken down with the fever, and his wife, during the next two days, was ministering to him incessantly. On Friday night she had a violent chill, but on Saturday her fever seemed to abate, although she was very weak. Her husband, who was now better, spoke comfortingly to the invalid, but the end was evidently near. She looked up at him and then muttered in prayer: "Dear Jesus, thy will be done; thy will be done." Those were the last intelligent words she ever spoke; shortly after, coma supervened and the faithful worker passed away peacefully to her rest on Sunday afternoon. She was buried in the little cemetery at Inhambane, the mission boys, whom she had taught in life, lovingly bearing her to her resting-place.

Mrs. Richards had been a missionary in Africa for ten years, four of which she had spent in Natal and nearly six in Inhambane. She was born in Ashland county, O., and received her preparatory education at an academy near her home. She learned to love the Saviour when quite young, and united with the church when about sixteen years of age. She entered Oberlin College in 1873. During her first year in college, she decided to devote her life to mission work, and during the rest of her college course, studied with special reference to preparing herself for this work. She graduated in 1877. In 1881 she was married to Rev. E. A. Richards, who was her class-mate in Oberlin College. In September, 1880, she, with her husband, started for Africa.

When Mr. and Mrs. Richards first left America, they expected to go up at once into the interior of Africa and establish a mission in Umzila's country. Mr. Pinkerton, from Natal, started some months ahead of them to explore and get permission of the king to go into his country, but this brave young missionary lost his life before he reached Umzila's country. The following year, Mr. Richards started on the same trip, explored the same country, received permission for the missionaries to go into it, but lay sick for a long time unable to return home. When finally he did return, it was decided to abandon the establishment of the mission in the interior and to start a new mission on the coast at Inhambane, some 600 miles north of the already established stations. Four missionaries volunteered to take up this work, two of whom were Mr. and Mrs. Richards. They found that two new languages must be learned, as neither Zulu nor English could be used there; the officials at the coast speaking Portuguese and the natives the Tonga language, which latter had never yet been reduced to writing. They found it difficult, at first, to get a start in the new language; but by patiently watching and listening, and trying to talk with the natives, they finally succeeded, and wrote the first spelling-book and dictionary the Tonga language had ever known, and then prepared charts and readers, and other school-books as they needed them in their teaching, and Gospel hymns, so that the natives could sing them in their own language. Thus book by book they worked together, until they had translated the whole of the New Testament into the Tonga language.

Mrs. Richards loved these people and put her best energies into the work for them, often having eight to twelve little ones in her home, and teaching the larger ones in the school, trying to show them what a Christian life and home should be. She visited and talked with the women in their huts, spoke to assemblies in the open air, and ministered to their sick. This constant, unceasing exertion, in a tropical climate, gradually wore her out, until she was no longer able to battle with the fever. She was sent to Natal, but grew worse until she was very low.

Hoping almost against hope, she started for America. The voyage was a great help to her and she gained rapidly after reaching this country. For two years previous to last Spring, she and her husband had been in the United States recuperating after their trying labors in the tropics. They left this country for Salisbury, Mashonaland, intending to found a mission there; but on arriving at Inhambane, they found that the war between the Matabeles and the South African Company had made their project temporarily impossible. Besides the railroad was not half completed, from the same cause. They accordingly resolved to stop at Inhambane, the scene of their former labors, and work for Christ. Mrs. Richards again got together a large number of pupils and established a school, while she and her husband were also active in general mission work and in translations. With a single exception, they were the only missionaries in a territory with 3,000,000 population. She also visited the women in their kraals and cared for many sick and suffering, who came to her daily, for she was their only physician. In the midst of this busy life, ministering to the physical, as well as the moral needs of this people, whom she had learned to love and to whose uplifting she had consecrated her life, she was stricken down with the fatal fever, just three months after reaching Inhambane. Up to the moment of her prostration, she attended to a multitude of duties, such as only a missionary's wife can understand. On the day before her illness, she carried food to a native woman, whom she believed to be more sick than herself. Two days later, this valiant Christian teacher died in harness—a fitting close to a beautiful, self-sacrificing, Christian life.

A Negro Prince's Welcome.

Missionary Snyder tells how the Missionaries at Luebo on Congo were received. A Realistic Glimpse of Mission Life.

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be greatly interested in the following letter from Rev. D. W. Snyder, a missionary on the Congo, which has kindly been sent to us by his sister, Mrs. DuBois, of Whiteport, N. Y.

LUEBO, CONGO FREE STATE, June 23, 1893. —Our Mission is situated about a mile from the river and about 200 feet above it. A beautiful path leads up to the Mission through the woods. A broad avenue, 150 yards long, leads from the entrance of the grounds up to the centre square, which will contain the mission house, with a missionary's home on each side. The Mission house will contain within its wall the barter goods, the treasurer's office and the living rooms of the treasurer and family.

Now, a moment given to the missionaries. These are the Rev. W. H. Sheppard, who at this writing is in America, and who is, as you know, a colored man from the United States; Mr. and Mrs. Adamson, Scotch-English, and Mr. and Mrs. Rowbotham, the writer and his wife. We must not omit Mr. Ockels who, we hope, is now nearing Matadi, and for whom we look to come on the next boat.

We have, at the present time, seventy-four natives belonging to the Mission. This includes twenty-seven children under fifteen years old. It would not be interesting to give their names, but one or two have become so identified with the Mission since the time of Mr. Lapsley, that their names will always be of interest. I refer to Ngululu and Ntombe.

A SCENE AT STANLEY POOL, CONGO FREE STATE.

At half-past six A. M. the gong rings and all our natives assemble in the chapel, which is under Mr. A's verandah. The roll is called, a song is sung, the Lord's Prayer recited in unison, another song, a prayer and the benediction. All sick are reported to Nganga Buke (the doctor, who at present is the writer).

The rest of our people go to Mr. Rowbotham, who gives out the day's work. Every day there are two sesions of schooling, over which the ladies preside. Prayer meeting Wednesday and Sunday evenings, and general worship at the village Sundays.

The staple medium of exchange is the cowrie—a shell about the size of a hazel nut, brought from India, I think; 100 of these are of about 5c's value here. Next comes fine wire, either brass, iron or copper, one fathom of which is worth about ten cowries and will buy an egg. Next come small beads, two thimblefuls of which are equal to ten cowries and will buy an egg, while about six thimblefuls will buy a fair-sized hen. You will see, by this, that the native looks upon a chicken as being of only three times the value of the egg she lays. Then cloth is used as a medium of exchange, eight yards of unbleached muslin being equal to about 4,000 cowries. All these prices are based on what these articles are worth, plus the transport from England. A boy or girl can be bought for eight yards of unbleached muslin. And a man or woman for double the amount.

The nearest village to us, where we hope to do most of our work, is among the Bekete—a tribe under the dominion of King Lukenga. They are lazy and do little else than drink mulafo, scold their wives and smoke tobacco. The women do all the work. They live on manioc (cassava) and Indian corn, goats, chickens and eggs. What trading they do is in rubber and ivory. Elephants roam in this part of Africa. Palm oil is not gathered, as the distance from the coast makes the transport cost more than the oil is worth: but when the railroad is completed, then the palm oil industry, with others, will open up. Still, I think the success of Congoland will rest upon the supply of rubber. Should that fail, it would hardly pay to come so far for the other articles.

Corn grows here and does exceedingly well. Vegetables will do as well as they do in Florida. The native subsists on cornmeal, chumbie (a flour or paste made from manioc), bananas, plantains, palm oil and palm-nuts. A quantity of pea-nuts too are consumed yearly. Fish are scarce and command a good price. Wild game, for eating, is scarce. What can be used consists of wild pigeons, guinea hens, parrots and monkeys. I have not tried the last named so cannot speak of their merits or demerits. We went out to shoot a monkey the other day, but could not get close enough to him. He had come within a short distance of the house, but retreated as fast as we advanced. He was as large as a five-year old boy, and had a white spot on his head that gave him the appearance of wearing a cap. We are free from snakes, I think, as not one has been seen since our arrival.

There are fairly good blacksmiths, weavers, carvers and mat-makers among the people. They make beautiful cloth, woven from thread made from the bud of the palm-tree and dyed in colors and woven to a pattern; the design is oriental, but where did they get it? Their carving is oriental, too.

On Monday we had a visit from King Lukenga's son. His cloth was trimmed with cowries and beads, while over each shoulder were ten strings of cowries and his legs, from the foot almost up to the knee, were covered with cowries. He must have had at least 10,000 cowries on his person, besides the beads and bangles. His body was stained a turkey red by using a dye made from cane-wood. He was attended by about ten subjects and brought us half a dozen fowls as a present ("macebish"), and of course expected from us a present of greater value. We gave him one piece, eight yards of unbleached muslin, and a few beads, and the "palaver" was finished. Then Mr. Adamson took his picture. The clock was a great wonder to him and called forth a hearty "m'lengala!" (good), but when Mrs. Snyder played a tune on the organ for him, his astonishment was still greater. He has told Mr. Adamson that his (the Prince's) heart is the same as Mr. Adamson's, which means that the Prince loves Mr. A. like his own brother. He has invited him to go and visit Lukenga.

My work with the sick will keep me here for the present. I hope to send another by the next boat, which leaves next October. We are away from civilization and get letters only twice a year. D. W. SNYDER.

SAFETY IN TRAVEL.

SO long as we keep the law of capital punishment by which, if a man takes the life of his fellow, the offender is put to death, it seems to me that those who slay many lives by neglect or carelessness ought to suffer as much as those who, by knife or pistol, take only one life. There is no justice in the arrangement by which he who does the less damage suffers more than he who inflicts the greater. But Coroners' juries render the verdict, a few editorials indignantly express the public sentiment, and the guilty soon slides out into society, and the only punishment he feels is the temporary loss of occupation. The practical question comes up, whether our great railroad companies are only made for the financial advantage of the stockholders, or whether sometimes the safety and convenience of the public ought to be taken into consideration.

But it is well to gratefully remember that notwithstanding all the accidents of modern travel, there is less life lost than by older modes of intercommunication. More perished by overturned stage coach and frightened horse than now by steamer or rail-train in proportion to the number of people who now travel. With millions of people in motion, it is nothing but a kind Providence which keeps the number of casualties so moderate. The typical American in one place wants to be in some other place, and he wants to get there at the rate of sixty miles an hour. By telegraphy, travel has been reduced to mathematical accuracy, and we are not to allow here and there the wickedness of engineer or conductor, or railroad directors, to make us forget that there has been no day like this, when journeying was so safe, so swift or so luxurious.

FIGURES THAT LIE.

ALL statistics fail to give full accounts of the moral and religious condition of communities. A vast number of positively religious people do not attend church. The statement may seem startling, but you will admit the facts as I explain them. First, there are tens of thousands of mothers in America who must tarry at home with their young children—their first duty to their household. Their religion is of as high a type as those who are always in the temple. Then there is a large number of Christian invalids kept within their doors, and living, perhaps, nearer to God in their homes than those Christians who are regular in church attendance. Then there are the aged, faithful in attendance on church service when they could get there; now hindered by infirmity and decrepitude.

Then there are tens of thousands of business men so tired out by Saturday night that on Sunday they sleep over. Their fatigue amounts to positive illness. They take the entire Sabbath for physical recuperation at home, and I should be very slow to doubt their Christian character on that account. In other words, there are hundreds of thousands of Christian people who appear in no statistics of church attendance. The real condition of the Church of God in this country and in all countries is far more encouraging than the hard statistics would seem to indicate. Look over the newspapers this season and see the reports of the ecclesiastical bodies, and realize that the most grandly organized movement in the world is the Church of God. Infidelity is not organized, atheism is not organized, bad literature is not organized; but here comes the Church of God with a complete organization which embraces and is going to conquer the whole world.

A SEDATIVE.

WHAT sublime rest in the thought that the roll of the centuries does not age the Omnipotent! In the nineteenth century, as in the first, in the dying groan of the world, as he was in the opening chant of creation, Master of all worlds and all centuries, from everlasting to everlasting, God the first, God the last, and this God our Father, this God our Friend, this God our shelter, this God our eternal home. If I had an idea that any man, or any party of men, had control of this world, I would not sleep nights for trepidation. Jehovah governs, so I have not a particle of fear. He will work out of the darkest gloom radiant consummations. Trust him for all. Eternity is his lifetime. The noonday sun is only a spark struck from his anvil. The ocean is a drop from the overflowing cup of his joy. All the ages of time are only a section of his forever. Why, then, should you fret about this, and worry about that, and wonder about the other thing? The Lord reigneth, let the earth be glad. There come times in our life when we seem hedged in and we do not know which way to turn. Patiently wait for the way to clear. No crisis of events can ever surprise the Lord. In his hand confide your health, your family, your business, your body, your mind, your soul.

USELESS DIVISION.

UNLESS you have investigated for yourself, you have no idea into what a multitude of fragments the Church is split. The Baptists divided into, first, regular; second, Campbellites; third, Dunkers; fourth, Free Will; fifth, Anti-Mission; sixth, Winnebrennarian; seventh, Seventh Day; eighth, Six-Principle; ninth, General; tenth, Mennonites. The Methodist Church is divided into, first, Methodist Episcopal Church, north; second, Methodist Episcopal Church, south; third, African Methodist Episcopal Church; fourth, Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; fifth, Colored Methodist Church; sixth, African Methodist Church; seventh, Union American Methodist Episcopal Church; eighth, Congregational Methodists; ninth, Primitive Methodists; tenth, Independent Methodists; eleventh, Free Methodists; twelfth, Welsh Calvinistic Methodists; thirteenth, Wesleyan Methodist Connection; fourteenth, Methodist Evangelical Association; fifteenth, Methodist Protestant; sixteenth, United Brethren in Christ. The Adventists are divided into: First, Second Adventists; second, Seventh Day Adventists; third, Evangelical Adventists; fourth, Non-Resurrection Adventists; fifth, Age to Come Adventists. The Quakers are divided into: First, Orthodox; second, Hicksite; third, Wilbur, or Friends on Original Principle; fourth, Kingsites; fifth, Lambornites; sixth, Progressives. The Presbyterians are divided into the Northern Presbyterians, Southern Presbyterians, Cumberland Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, Reformed Presbyterians, Associate Reformed Presbyterians and many other denominations more in number than I have mentioned are more or less absurdly cut up into a great ecclesiastical hash, with enough salt of real grace to keep it, and enough pepper of biting controversy to spice it, but, nevertheless, hash. With some it is a question of robes; with some, a question of days; with some, a question about non-essentials, so small that the theologian has to get his dictionary to find them. The mere recital of their names shows the necessity that something be done for their combination. If this world is ever taken for God, and its sins overthrown, it will be by forgetfulness of unimportant differences and the marching of all the hosts of God in solid column to attack. The sixteen kinds of Methodists will come under one wing, the ten kinds of Baptists must come under another wing, and the seven kinds of Presbyterians under still another wing. After all the branches of each denomination have united, then the great denominations nearest akin will unite, and this absorption shall go on until there shall be one great millennial Church, divided only for convenience into geographical sections, and as of old it was the Church of Laodicea, and the Church of Philadelphia, and the Church of Thyatira, so it shall be the Church of America, and the Church of Africa, and the Church of Australia. Of that world-wide Church there will be only one article of creed—Christ first, Christ last, and Christ forever.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

A great wrong has been done me. My sermon on "Christian Citizenship; or, The Christian at the Ballot Box," which I preached and published about twenty years ago and which may be found in one of the volumes of my sermons published at the time by Harper & Bros., and which I again delivered recently by request, has been re-published in compressed form in Maynard, Merrill & Co.'s "Practical Reader," pages 185, 186 and 187, and there credited to Wendell Phillips. From letters recently received from all parts of the country, it is evident that this publication by Maynard, Merrill & Co. puts me under the charge of plagiarism, a charge that I will not abide. The article quoted is mine, and I do not believe that Wendell Phillips ever delivered it.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

S. E. Madison, Hartland, Kansas. What six Protestant denominations have the largest membership?

These, in order named: Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Disciples of Christ and Congregational.

J. P. Liebman, Albany, N. Y. I remember, about a year or two ago, reading in an advertisement, that you had a few maps of Palestine left. I think it was a large map you advertised, but forgot the size. Will you please say how large the map is and what you ask for it?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S colored map of Palestine, approved by Dr. Talmage as eminently accurate. Is just 36 inches long by 28 wide and is beautifully printed on bond paper. We have 84 left, which we will send to purchasers by mail at 25 cts. each.

F. G. Jackson, East Jefferson, Me. 1. Is the premium From Manger to Throne, given to old subscribers who renew? 2. Can you tell where one can purchase tracts?

1. Yes, the opportunity to secure a copy of From Manger to Throne is open to all subscribers, old as well as new. We cannot overlook our old subscribers. In renewing your subscription, send $2, which entitles you to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year and also to a copy of From Manger to Throne. 2. Write to J. E. Jewett, bookseller, Bible House, N. Y.

Mrs. S. Alexander, Cortland, N. Y. How many saw Christ when he ascended to heaven? Is there any record that tells about it, besides the Bible?

He visibly passed from earth to heaven in presence of his disciples only, as recorded in Mark 16: 19; Luke 24: 50, 51; Acts 1: 1–11. Many books have been written on the subject of the Ascension, and it is fully treated in Neander's Life of Christ, as also in the later lives of the Saviour by Geikie and Edersheim. Probably a hundred famous monographs have been written and published on the same subject.

M. M. Philadelphia, Pa. Cannot THE CHRISTIAN HERALD supply a simple prayer suitable for an occasion to draw together a little church in the wilderness. One of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for which I subscribe, is wanted for such a case. They have a service, selected which I hope may be followed by a church. They have no THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and two good sermons and sweet hymns, but they have no prayer, and I do not suppose there are men among them who would offer a prayer. I have tried to induce the lady in charge to take up this part of her duty, but it would be a great help if she could have a prayer such as I suggest.

Our correspondent's suggestion is not a new one, for we have already had, from different quarters, a number of somewhat similar requests. We do not agree with her, however, that a prayer so prepared would meet the special needs of such a congregation or of an individual. The only prayer that meets the universal need of man is that taught by the Saviour to his disciples. Even the beautiful prayer-service of the Protestant Episcopal Church—probably the finest in the English language—does not meet the needs of the heart and the repetition grows mechanical. The leader in such a service as our correspondent mentions should find it both a duty and a pleasure to pray, even if the prayer be limited to a few simple halting utterances, right from her heart. Let her lay the wants of her little flock before the Lord and urge others to pray also, and the hesitancy she now experiences will soon disappear. There can be no spiritual life in a church that is without prayer.

Emma L. Trowbridge, Cross River, N. Y., writes:

I received my From Manger to Throne Monday afternoon. I am delighted with it! My cousins, near Tarrytown, have one for which they paid $3.75. I always wanted to have one of my own, but didn't feel as if I could afford to pay so much. Most truly do I thank you for it. The paper, too, I think very much of.

E. and W. Cheney, Cleveland, O. Two young men, both under 17 years, desire to study, one to become a missionary and the other a minister. Financial circumstances do not permit them to go to college. How shall they realize their ambition?

Many colleges have an endowment provision for the reception of students situated as our correspondents are. Write to the pastor of your own denomination inquiring whether he will grant you a certificate of recommendation to the denominational college. This would in any event be necessary to secure your admittance. For information regarding missionary training, write to Rev. A. B. Simpson, 692 8th ave., New York.

Mrs. Isabella Pearce, Clarksburg, Mo. Was Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, whom Christ raised from the dead, the same Lazarus who lay at the rich man's gate, full of sores?

No; Lazarus of Bethany, the brother of Mary and Martha and the friend of Jesus, was a real person; while Lazarus mentioned in Luke 16: 19–31, existed only in the parable. He was a type, and not a living individual, just as the unjust steward, the prodigal son, and the woman with the piece of silver were types, chosen for the purpose of the spiritual instruction and edification of those to whom the Saviour spoke.

Reader, Lonacoming, Ind. 1. When does a man become a drunkard? 2. Was the wine which Christ made fermented or unfermented?

1. The definition of the word by Webster is "one who habitually drinks to excess." A man who is overtaken by temptation and becomes intoxicated for the first time, would not be correctly described as a drunkard, but he is in serious danger of becoming one. 2. The process of fermentation requires time and the narrative indicates that in this case the wine was drunk immediately after it was made. There is no means of knowing whether it was intoxicating or not; but from Christ's character we should infer that it was not.

Constant Reader, Stratford, Ont., has forwarded a copy of a beautiful hymn composed by Rev. Mr. Hart, an English minister, many years ago, entitled: "Gethsemane." It is too long for publication in our columns, but we will forward it to the subscriber who inquired for it, if he will send us his address. Constant Reader adds:

I also send the last verse of a very quaint hymn by the same writer, which, if you publish, may (as it is easily memorized) prove, as it has done, a veritable song in the darkness to many weary ones:

This God is the God we adore,
Our faithful, unchangeable Friend:
His love is as great as his power,
And neither knows measure nor end.
'Tis Jesus, the first and the last,
Whose spirit shall guide us safe home:
We'll praise him for all that is past,
And trust him for all that's to come.

The letter of "Subscriber, Chicago," has attracted a good deal of attention, and "The Mail-Bag" has received a number of letters this week from other readers on the subject. Harry Cott of Staunton, Va., writes:

A Christian friend of mine has loaned me a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Nov. 8, and in looking down "Our Mail-Bag," I read the experience of "Subscriber, Chicago." The all-absorbing query of that soul is as to whether it has passed from death unto life. What it needs is to have God's way of salvation clearly set before it—something that the person's experience proves has never been done. "Subscriber" should go to Revell's or the Evangelical Publishing House, Chicago, and procure a little tract or book, setting forth God's Way of Salvation. This is from one who, I assure you, counts no importunities by this request, but only to have troubled souls brought into joy and peace.

"Reader," Indianapolis, writes:

"Subscriber" seems to be in darkness regarding her spiritual welfare. I will suggest a book for her to read which has been a great benefit to those who have read it: The Christian Secret of a Happy Life, by H. W. S., author of Abiding in Christ.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE JAPANESE CALAMITY.

FROM San Francisco comes the news which was brought to that port by the steamer China, of a double disaster in Japan. A typhoon of extraordinary violence on the Western coast, followed by high floods in the Southern and Middle provinces worked fearful havoc to life and property. Forty-four fishing boats were wrecked at Oita alone; and at Tanowia the loss of shipping was enormous,and in nearly every instance the crews perished with their vessel. The visitation on land was similarly fatal. At Futakata-gun in Hyogo-ken wind and flood combined to tear away a large section of a mountain, which rolling down into a valley completely annihilated two villages. The Tsurusakigaiva River burst its banks and carried many houses with their inmates out to sea. At the city of Toyama eighty houses were carried away and more than a thousand ruined by the water. When the China left Japan, the appalling account was not complete, but at that time it was known that the number of deaths exceeded fifteen hundred, about six hundred vessels had been wrecked and nearly four thousand houses demolished. The places which have suffered most severely are the small fishing villages near the coasts and on the banks of the rivers, where the houses are lightly built and incapable of resisting the combined forces of wind and water. The picture on this page represents a scene in such a village. It is from a photograph taken in the Island of Yezo, the most northerly and least civilized of the Japanese Islands. The Yezo men are especially interesting from the fact that they are believed to be descendants of the aborigines of Japan. They differ in appearance from the ordinary Japanese especially in the thickness of hair and beard. They have been among the sufferers by the recent calamities. One can have no feeling but pity for such people as they must live near their work and are too poor to build more substantial houses. The same excuse cannot be made for those people whose conduct Christ compared to these foolish builders. Their habitations fall, too, when "the floods come and the winds beat" on them, and those builders lose more than their property. (Matt. 7: 27).

A SCENE IN YEZO, JAPAN, RECENTLY DEVASTATED BY TYPHOONS AND FLOODS.

A Heroic Rescuer.

The thrilling experience of two geologists is described by a Boston journal. It states that two men, uncle and nephew, were exploring some rocks overhanging the sea. As they rounded a projecting angle,the rock on which the younger man stood gave way. With remarkable presence of mind he grasped the ledge with one hand and extended the other to his uncle, who caught it and held it firmly. The elder man had not more than about six inches of standing ground and all his strength was insufficient to draw his nephew up. He struggled for about five minutes, but without result. Looking sheer down he saw a jagged rock projecting, on which, if his nephew dropped, he would fall and be dashed to pieces. Below that rock, the cliff was hollow and there was nothing to break the fall into the water. A man springing from the ledge might clear the rocks and fall unhurt into the sea. But the young man hanging by his hands could not spring. The uncle's mind was quickly made up. "Loose the rock, Tom," he said. It seemed to the young man like givingup his one slender hope of life, but he obeyed. The uncle, holding his nephew's wrist with a tight clutch in both hands, gathered all his strength and gave a mighty leap forward. The two men,linked together,turned a somersault as they descended, but they cleared the projecting rock and struck the water at a deep place and slowly and painfully swam ashore. The young man could have given no greater proof of his faith in his uncle than by letting go the rock. It is such faith—the faith that lets go all dependence on good works, on church-attendance and all else and depending solely on Christ, that is the sinner's way to salvation. (Rom. 4: 5).

A Buzzard's Mistake.

The western correspondent of a Boston journal relates a curious experience of an intoxicated man. He says that a man who had been drinking heavily was sleeping off the effects of his debauch in a fence-corner of a vacant lot, when a buzzard in search of food caught sight of him and alighted to take an observation. The man lay motionless, and the bird drew nearer. At length, apparently satisfied that the man was dead, and consequently his lawful prey, the buzzard took a vigorous peck at the drunkard's nose. The man was roused instantly, and putting his hand to his bleeding nose, he looked around for his assailant. The bird was only a short distance away, and the drunkard readily understood the situation. "Look here, you buzzard," he said, "you're a mite too previous, don' cher know? I objec' to be eat up shust now. I hain't dead." The indignation of the man was natural,but when he declared that he was not dead, he failed to realize a spiritual fact. He and others who are living in sin and self-indulgence cannot be said to be really alive. All in them that raises them above the level of the beast is dead. (1 Tim. 5:6).

Mistaken in the Place.

An amusing experience recently befell the President of Mount Holyoke College. She is an enthusiastic advocate of temperance, and is often invited to deliver addresses on the subject, which are always able and effective. Not long ago she accepted an invitation to attend a temperance meeting at Springfield and was rather confused by conflicting directions as to the place where the conference was to be held. At length, she walked into a large room and a large crowd and settled herself comfortably, looking about her with smiles of satisfaction that so many men were interested in the cause of prohibition and were present to discuss it. Then it dawned upon her as equally strange and not so gratifying that her own sex was sparsely represented. She felt a vague distrust, and leaned over to a neighbor: "This is the Methodist Church, isn't it?" she inquired. "No Ma'am," was the bland answer, "it's the Police Court." The lady naturally beat a hasty retreat from so uncongenial a place. Her message, however, was being taught there but by a sterner teacher: and the class who learn it in such places is composed of men who might never have gone there if they had learned the lesson earlier. (Prov. 28: 14).

French Law in New York.

An exciting scene was witnessed in the French Consulate in New York on November 15. A lawsuit is pending in Paris in which several citizens of New York are interested, and the French courts have appointed Vicomte d'Abzac, the French Consul here, a commissioner to take the testimony of the American witnesses. At the hearing, a New York lawyer representing the defendant in the action, who is an American citizen, presented himself and notified the consul of his position in relation to the case. The consul received him courteously, but informed him that the French rules of procedure would be observed. When the first witness took the stand, the consul said, "Now make your deposition; tell us all you know about the case." The lawyer thereupon interposed on the ground that the request was too general, and the witness should be asked specific questions. She was, he said, a witness for his client, and he was entitled to examine her. The consul, however, refused to allow him to do so, and the witness went on to tell her story in her own way, the consul putting a question occasionally to elicit the full details. The proceedings exasperated the lawyer, as his own witness was damaging his case by her volubility, and he again vigorously protested. The consul, however, assured him that the procedure was in strict accordance with French law; to which the lawyer replied that French law did not apply in New York,and he had no respect for it. It was the consul's turn to get angry now, and he ordered the lawyer out of court and summoned a policeman to enforce the order. The hearing consequently went on in the lawyer's absence, the consul insisting that the consulate was French soil, on which French law was supreme. The Christian sometimes forgets that a similar principle applies to him in his business and worldly concerns. Methods and practices which the law of the land permits he must not adopt if they are contrary to the laws of the heavenly kingdom of which he is a subject. (Eph. 5: 3, 4.)

A Novel Motor-power.

An ingenious method of assisting street-cars up a steep grade is in operation at Seattle, Wash. The cars are run on the level by electricity in the ordinary way, but when the grade is reached, a coupling bar on the car attaches it to a steel cable on the other end of which running in a conduit are two counter-weights aggregating six tons. The weights are at the top of the hill when the car is at the bottom and as they descend they put sufficient force on the cable to draw the car up. The car in descending is again attached to the cable and its momentum draws the counter-weights up the hill again ready for the use of the next ascending car. Automatic ranches and air-cushions made of iron pipes,perfect the mechanism, which is found to work admirably without the help of horses or steam-power. By this ingenious application of a natural law the cars provide their own motive power. This is one of the natural laws that do not apply in the spiritual world. No one who takes the downward course there helps another to rise; on the contrary, he is apt to drag others down with him. (Eccles 9: 18).

BRIEF NOTES.

The American Board appears to have adopted Civil Service Reform rules. The position so long and ably occupied by Dr. C. H. Daniells as New York representative of the Board, is to be filled now that Dr. Daniells has gone to Boston to succeed Dr. Alden,by Dr. C. C. Creegan who has been Field Secretary of the Board for six years.

The Congregational Church at Carsonville, Mich., has been blessed with a remarkable revival. Special services have been held there and at an outlying station three miles distant, and in both places the results have been notable. Many backsliders have been restored and a large number of the young people have been added to the church.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is meeting with much success in his work at Lima, O. It has been found necessary to hold services simultaneously in the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches, both of which are crowded nightly. At a meeting limited to persons under conviction of sin and desiring spiritual guidance, over two hundred persons were present, and Dr. Munhall, Mr. Birch and several ministers of the city dealt with them personally. The number of conversions is likely to be large.

The Rev. Edward A. Lawrence, D.D., of Baltimore, died November 10th. He had been very prominent of late in city missionary work in that city, living himself in the poorer quarter that he might gain easier access to the people.

The many friend of the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., will grieve to learn that he is dead. He passed away peacefully on the night of Nov. 18, at the house of his daughter in New York. His portrait and a sketch of his life appear on another page.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey will commence their next season's campaign by a series of services at Providence, R. I. The report that they are going to Europe is unauthorized and incorrect. They received an urgent invitation from a large number of English ministers, but decided not to accept it for the present. They will probably go to England to labor in the fall of next year.

Rev. M. S. Rees of Elmira, N. Y., is conducting union evangelistic meetings at Littleton, N. H. Four churches are uniting in the movement and there is a general interest through the town. The leading business men close their stores every evening at an early hour to allow their employes an opportunity of attending. Next Sunday Mr. Rees begins union services at Rochester, N. Y.

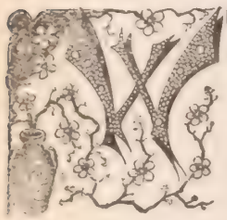
The revival services conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison in Embury M. E. church, Brooklyn, of which Dr. W. W Bowdish is pastor, are increasing in interest and power. The church is crowded at each service and many have professed conversion. On November 19 sixty persons made profession of faith. The converts are of all ages, from fifteen to seventy years. Mr. Harris announces a Jubilee Service on December 3.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

BURNING HEARTS.

Preached last Sunday morning, Nov. 26, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

Text: Luke 24: 32: "And they said one to another, "Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the scriptures?"



E find two disciples in deep sorrow leaving Jerusalem and going toward Emmaus, a small town situated between seven and eight miles from Jerusalem. This journey was undertaken, it would seeem, between midday and the early evening. It was the day of our Lord's glorious resurrection. The name of one of the disciples was Cleopas; the name of the other we cannot discover. Probably we never shall know it; but it is enough for us to know that it is graven on the palms of Jehovah's hands; enough for us to know that perhaps we shall one day learn it when the Lord shall write up his people. Some have supposed that it was Simon; others that it was Luke himself, but it is useless to speculate on a matter which the Holy Spirit has not revealed.

As these men walked in their sadness, they talked with great earnestness; and one seemed to be talking and arguing with more hope than the other. The original language which describes their conversation suggests the earnestness of their spirit, and the vigor of the argumentation in which they indulged. It is easy for us to imagine what the subjects of their conversation would be; easy to suppose that they were discussing the great events connected with our Lord's arrest, trial, condemnation and crucifixion. We know, too, that vague rumors concerning his resurrection were current in the city before they left; indeed it is strange that they could leave the city until they had either verified or falsified those reports. There certainly was much of which they might speak regarding the wondrous events which had happened in Jerusalem during the past few days, and thus sadly do they walk and talk.

The Three Travelers.

A stranger overtakes them and participates in their conversation; we know, although they did not, that this stranger is none other than the august Person of whom they were speaking and reasoning. To them he seemed to be an ordinary traveler on that frequented highway. There is nothing peculiar at the outset in his dress, manner, or speech to suggest that he is the Son of God and the Redeemer of men. Their eyes, we are told, were holden that they should not know him. The disciples frequently failed to recognize our Lord during the forty days between his resurrection and his ascension; on that very morning Mary Magdalene failed to recognize her Lord and Master. Perhaps this result was partly due to the exercise of some strange power over the vision of the disciples; and perhaps it was partly due to a change in the appearance of the Lord himself; it would seem as if his body were already assuming some of the characteristics of its subsequent full glorification. It is certain that some alteration had taken place in his appearance, an alteration which was sufficient to throw doubt over his identity, until his disciples gave him their more careful consideration. It is evident that the two disciples journeying toward Emmaus did not know at once who was their companion, and thus for a time the blessed Lord walked with [illegible] was not unlike our own. How often the divine Lord walks with us in our daily life, in our severe trials and in our blessed experiences, when for a time we do not recognize [illegible] him not! How often have we prayed that we might find him, when in reality he was by our side! Too often, like Mary in the garden, we look at him through a veil of tears, and fail to recognize his presence; too often, like the disciples in the fourth watch of the night, we fail to know him when he comes to us walking over the foaming billows!

But though unrecognized by them, Christ's heart is drawn out in tender sympathy and in great love toward these sad travelers toward Emmaus. His words recall them to themselves and enable them to think clearly of what has passed in Jerusalem. Let us look for a little time at these three travelers. The two men, so far as we know, had performed no remarkable services for Jesus; perhaps one of them may have occupied a position of relationship; but the Lord did not draw near to them on that account. If relationship were to be he would have manifested himself especially to his mother during his resurrection life; but her name does not once appear in the entire record of this period. After he committed her to the care of John while himself hung on the cross, he seemed to drop the claims of early relationship. Had these travelers been Peter or John, Christ's approach to them would not have been surprising; but they were not apostles, and they were not of prominence among the seventy disciples. But our Lord's first words to them may explain the reason of his approach. He certainly did not need to ask them for information, for he knew what was in man; but he questioned them that he might gain ready access to their sorrowful hearts. In their surprise they seemed scarcely to know how to answer him; they think he must be a stranger in Jerusalem, not to know the wonderful things that have come to pass there in the last few days. Wonderful traveler! This stranger is the Lord of life and glory! That morning he left Joseph's tomb in triumph, leaving death and hell in captivity. On that journey he opens to the travelers the scriptures and soon their hearts burn within them.

He remains to the evening meal; in the breaking of bread in the humble home he is recognized, and back to the city hasten the joyous disciples. Never was a journey so short; and even before they start they ask in the words of the text, "Did not our hearts burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?"

My theme this morning is "Burning Hearts in Christian Work." Burning hearts are necessary to the highest success in Christian service; burning hearts can be secured; burning hearts will be sure to manifest themselves in speech and action.

In the first place, glowing hearts, hearts glowing with love to Christ, and love for the souls of men, are one of the great needs of the hour. Why have Christians so little Power in Christian Service?

Why move the wheels of God's chariot slowly? Why are there not thousands converted in a day? Why should one sermon on the day of Pentecost convert three thousand, while in our day it takes almost three thousand sermons to convert one soul? Certainly one answer to this question is that the hearts of so many professors of religion are cold in Christian service; and as a result the power of the Church is largely latent. It has been well said that a powerless Christian ought to be as great a misnomer as a forceless thunderbolt, Christians need burning hearts to give them earnest desires to work for Jesus. There are thousands in good and regular standing in our churches, who have no sense of personal responsibility for the conversion of their friends and neighbors. There are thousands who have never put forth personal efforts to secure the conversion of even one soul. It has not entered into their minds that membership in a church implies the existence of such desires, and the making of such efforts; and still they stand well in the church, and could at any time receive a letter to another church certifying to the integrity of their character, and the regularity of their standing.

It is worth much to be impelled by the sense of duty to seek the salvation of those with whom we are in contact; but it is better to be drawn sweetly by the cross of divine human love. Those who have a desire to work for Jesus will always find a field of labor; opportunities abound did we but desire to do our duty. We ought to have a passion for souls; no man can enjoy the love of God fully, except he shares it generously. There is the more a man gives away the more he has, and the less he gives away the less he keeps for himself. Matthew Henry said: "I would think it a greater happiness to gain one soul to Christ, than mountains of silver and gold to myself." This is the spirit which ought to dwell in the hearts of all Christian believers, if they had a full realization of the wondrous love of God, of the value of a human soul, and of the danger to which it is exposed, they would rather be the means of its salvation, than to possess the greatest of earth's treasures for themselves.

The desire of John Knox when he cried out, "Oh, God! give me Scotland or I die," ought to be the controlling element in the lives of all Christians. The love of Christ in the heart burns up the cross of selfishness, melts the coldness of worldliness, and quickens the deadness of indifference in every true believer; this love will manifest itself in their words, acts, tones and looks. The prayer of the Christian ought to be, "Oh, God! give us hearts on fire with divine love."

We need burning hearts to give us power in working for Christ. It is not merely what a man speaks or does, but the spirit in which he speaks and acts, that gives him power with men. It is the man behind the words which gives them irresistible force, which throws them out with projectile power. It was said that every word of some of Webster's great speeches weighed pounds. We know that it was not simply the needle guns of the Germans, but the intelligence of the soldiers behind the guns which wrought such havoc among the French in the Franco-Prussian war; it was the schools of Germany which annihilated the soldiers of France. Richard Sheridan was accustomed to say, "I often go to hear Rowland Hill because his ideas come red-hot from the heart." Dr. John M. Mason, when asked for an explanation of the remarkable power of Dr. Chalmers, replied, after taking time for careful consideration, "His blood earnestness." The Chinese convert was quite right when he said, "We want to tell us of the love of Christ." If our words are to move men like an electric battery, we must be saturated with the love of the Lord Jesus. If that love be in our hearts, it will make our words mighty over the hearts of others; if we be constrained by Christ's love, men will take knowledge of us that we have been with the Lord, and they will yield to the power of his truth incarnated in our lives, and preached by our glowing words. This life will give us unspeakable joy in our work, and that joy of the Lord will be our strength in manifesting a true Christian character, and in declaring by our words and acts the glorious Gospel of the blessed God.

How may burning hearts be secured? It is certain that one element of preparation for securing them is sadness because of their absence. Why did Christ go to these diciples? We have already seen that his visit was not due to any great service which they had performed, neither was it because of near relationship. They had not occupied a prominent position in his service up to this time; they were not apostles, and they were not even of the seventy. Still our Lord gave them more time than he ever gave, so far as the record goes, to any disciples during his resurrection life. Doubtless their sadness had its influence in drawing "the Man of sorrows" to their side. During this first resurrection day he had already appeared to Mary as she wept at the tomb, in her he had already appeared to Peter, who poured forth, as we well may believe, his tears of penitence, and now he joins himself to these two disappointed and almost broken-hearted disciples. The grief of Mary was that of a grateful and loving heart robbed of the object of its devotion; the grief of Peter was that of a heart smitten with a sense of ingratitude, cowardice and open betrayal. But the grief of the two disciples was that of men disappointed in their hopes, and sunk in despondency because of their disappointment. Grief ever touches the heart of the Son of God. Longing for him draws him to our side; grieving because of his absence helps greatly to secure his presence. Do we long to-day for his companionship as we walk life's dusty highway? That very longing he understands and will speedily meet by his blessed presence.

There are subtle laws, but little understood as yet, by which thinking of and longing for the absent, move upon them by processes which we cannot understand; there is here a great realm of mystery acted upon by laws which sometime we shall understand. Facts abundantly warrant us in affirming that earnest thought of one absent, tends to influence the thoughts and desires of the one thus considered. Now if these things be true among men, how much more possible and true they are in our relation to him who knows the thoughts and desires of every soul! Are you grieving because of the absence of your Lord? That grieving he understands, to it he will promptly respond, and he will crown your life with his own gracious presence. Are you disappointed? Are your hopes blasted? Is your sadness deep to-day? Then know that to you, as to the disciples on the stormy Galilean sea, Jesus will come walking over the crested billows of your grief; to you, as to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, Jesus will come making his presence known, and causing your hearts to burn with holy joy and to glow with heavenly love.

Where to Look.

We see also that studying the Bible to find Jesus brings Jesus near. This narrative greatly helps us at this point; doubtless these disciples were studying carefully the events which had occurred during the past few days; doubtless they were trying to find some relation between these events and the facts of revelation. There was very much about which they might well reason and dispute; the questions would justify and the narrative implies vigorous disputation. How could their Master yield to the power of his enemies, and be shamefully crucified? How could they reconcile his repeated claims to divinity and his manifestations of almighty power with his submission to his enemies?

Various sayings of his now return to preplex their mind, and to suggest mysterious and confused notions concerning his character and mission. They had also heard just before leaving Jerusalem that certain women had found the sepulchre empty, and had seen angels who had declared that he was not dead but alive. Could he really be alive? I have often wondered that they could leave the city without fuller information, while such rumors were in the air; but it is certain that they did not really believe in his resurrection. All his prophecies on that point had preplexed their minds. Now, however, he draws near as their great Enlightener; he unfolds to them the scriptures concerning himself. Wonderful moment!

Marvellous Teacher!

Never before had they seen the Old Testament prophecy in the light of this hour. Jesus showed them how he himself was the subject of these prophecies. There are men now who tell us that the Old Testament is obsolete.

Not so did Christ teach. He began at Moses and all the prophets and expounded to the disciples the scriptures concerning himself. He rebuked them because of their slowness of heart, because of their ignorance of the true meaning of their own scriptures. They needed his rebuke, and they found that he wounded them, but to give them divine healing and assured comfort. He who searches the scriptures, and does not find Christ in them does not search and teach as did the Christ himself.

We cannot suppose that they had a copy of the Old Testament scriptures with them; but they knew the leading passages by heart. Perhaps Christ showed them the meaning of such a prophecy as that of Moses raising up a prophet like unto himself; such prophecy as that of Isaiah when he saw the glory of the suffering and triumphant Messiah; and such as that of Daniel speaking of the Messiah who should be cut off for the sins of the people. These, and similiar prophecies, he may have unfolded to their dull minds. There is a long line of such prophecy; there is a golden thread of Messianic truth running through the warp and woof of the Old Testament; there is a crimson cord let down from every window of this ancient and inspired prophecy. Everywhere we see the Paschal lamb, the smitten rock, the serpent of brass and the blood-sprinkled mercy seat. O critics, are not ye fools and slow of heart not to believe the glorious things which the prophets have spoken? Ought ye not to see that Christ must have suffered on the cross that he might enter into the glory? Do ye not know that the cross is

"The great world's altar stairs
That slope through darkness up to God."

It is true also that beseeching Christ to tarry secures his abiding in our hearts and homes. Soon the travelers reach the village to which they were going; and the illustrous stranger makes as if he would go further. Is he guilty of attempted imposition? Who will dare so affirm? He is entirely sincere; he certainly will go further if they do not beseech him to remain.

Jesus is ever Passing by and he will not stay but constantly go beyond us if we do not detain him; he stands at the door of our hearts and knocks, and except we open he will pass on. It is toward evening and he turns in to make himself the guest in this lowly home. O blessed visitor! O holy guest! Let our prayer now be, "Come in, come in, Thou blessed son of God!" Let that prayer often ascend in holy song,

"Abide with me! Fast falls the eventide,
The darkness deepens, Lord, with me abide
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, O abide with me!"

He did come in to abide! The evening meal is spread; he lifts his hands in blessing, and now the disciples are filled with holy joy because of their rapturous recognition. Something in his manner of blessing and breaking the bread, caused their eyes to open, and they knew him. It has been suggested that when he lifted his hands in blessing, they saw in his palms the print of the nails; but perhaps it was only his manner of breaking and giving the bread which recalled to their minds some former peculiarity of manner and tone which assured them that it was indeed the Lord. Do we have a welcome in our homes, a place at our tables, and a throne in our hearts for thee, blessed Christ?

How are burning hearts manifested? The narrative helps us at this point also. These disciples went back to the city; they had not expected so to do; but they cannot remain in Emmaus with this glorious knowledge in their hearts. Never was a journey so short and so joyous. They left Jerusalem not to return; they now hasten back; with flying feet they run to tell

Their Thrilling Story.

Religion makes the Christian's duties easy and joyous; when the love of God is in the heart the yoke of duty is easy and the burden of service is light. When they reached Jerusalem they became preachers; they hastened to the upper room where the other disciples were gathered. All had heard the reports of the women, of Mary Magdalene, and of Peter; and these disciples now add their testimony to that of the other witnesses to the resurrection. They could say with Jeremiah, "His word was in mine heart as a burning fire, shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay." They could say with the Psalmist, "My heart was hot within me; while I was musing the fire burned; then spake I with my tongue." Once more they were rewarded by a sight of the risen Lord; soon he is in the midst of them, and soon his "peace be unto you" falls upon their wondering and joyous hearts.

If the love of God be in our hearts, we cannot but speak what we have seen and felt; we will arise like these disciples the same hour, even though it be night, and will hasten to tell our glad siory; and we shall experience something of their blissful enthusiasm; and we, like them, shall be rewarded with another sight of the Lord.

Do you wish for burning hearts in Christ's service? Then bring your cold hearts now to Jesus. The way to drive out cold is to let in heat; the way to banish darkness is to admit light. O men and women, long for the presence of the Lord; study his Word to find him; pray him to come in and to tarry with you. Then the mysterious stranger will meet you by the way and cause your hearts to burn within you; and then when you have hastened to tell another of the joy that you have found, once more the Christ will meet you, and his sweet benediction as heaven's choicest blessing will fall upon your souls.

INDIVIDUALITY.

(Every one shall give account of himself to God.)

I laid me down by night and slept, and lo,
A heavenly visitant in garments white,
Toward my couch with stately mien approached,
His presence filled the darkened room with light.

"Come, child of earth, before the Maker stand,
The King of kings would audience hold with thee;
Fear not to leave the narrow halls of Time,
Beyond the mansions of eternity."

I rose, and with my guide was quickly borne
On rapid wings beyond this vale of tears:
Sweet strains of music filled the enchanted air,
Soothing my heart and calming all my fears.

When, lo! there burst before my wondering gaze,
A countless multitude from every land,
Assembled all before the great white throne,
From Polar seas and India's burning strand.

The King, in glorious majesty, surveyed
The motley throng arraigned before his bar,
His eyes like coals of liquid fire, ablaze
With justice shone like unto dazzling star.

When, suddenly, the great roll-call I heard,
And, one by one, to judgment slowly came,
Each soul before the great tribunal stood,
Reponsive to his own familiar name.

"But must I answer?" I obey the call,
"Will no one stand and plead my guilty case?"
"Ah, no, for substitution now is past
And thou must stand alone before his face."

With pleading eyes my sovereign's face I scanned,
Could I of comfort catch one fitful gleam?
Oh, can it be? He whispered, "All is well!"
Trembling I woke—and lo, 'twas but a dream.

APOCALYPTIC SYMBOLISM.

The Basis of Discovery of the Key to the Images and Symbols of the Apocalypse.

BY THE LATE SIR S. A. BLACKWOOD.*

THE book of the Revelation is not to be construed literally. Its figurative or allegorical form must be apprehended if its prophetic teachings are to be understood.

Can we find a key which will unlock the mysterious terms and open to us "the things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world?" I believe we can. Such a key is given to us, first in those symbolic prophecies of the Old Testament, which all admit to have been fulfilled, and then in the explanations vouchsafed by the Divine Author of the Apocalypse itself.

First, in the Old Testament. It is astonishing to notice how almost every symbol which is made use of in the Revelation has been already employed by the prophets of former days, and either interpreted by them, or explained by the accomplishment of their predictions. Thus, to take a few instances, we know that the sun and moon and stars of Genesis 37 denoted the heads of Israel, the powers that rule—that their obscuration or fall figured the overthrow of a dynasty, state, or kingdom—e. g., Is. 13:1—10, the fall of Babylon; Ez. 32:2, 7, 8, 11, the destruction of Egypt by Babylon—that the overflowing of a river meant the irruption of a mighty nation over neighboring territories (Is. 8:7, 8); that the four wild beasts of Dan. 7 represented four kings or kingdoms which were to arise (verses 17-23; that the locusts of Joel 1, prefigured the nations which were to lay Israel waste; that "the sea and waves roaring" described the tumultuous uprising of peoples and nations (Ps. 65:7; Is. 5:30, 17:12, 60:5; Jer. 6:23, 51:52, 55). Space will not admit of further instances; but the line of study will amply repay the diligent searcher after truth. The Old Testament key will fit many a ward in the Apocalyptic lock.

But, secondly, the Giver of the Revelation, who hath the key of David, has himself placed it in our hands. He has not, it is true, explained every symbol; but he has given explanations of no less than thirteen as a sufficient indication of the way in which his servants are to interpret the remaining ones. They are the following:—

1. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches (ch. 1:20).
2. The seven candlesticks are the seven churches (ch. 1:20).
3. The two witnesses are two candlesticks or churches (ch. 11:4).
4. The dragon, or serpent, is the devil (ch. 12:9).
5. The three frogs are demoniacal spirits (ch. 16:14).
6. The seven heads of the beast are seven mountains (ch. 17:9).
7. The seven heads are also seven kings, or powers (ch. 17:10).
8. The beast is one of those powers (ch. 17:11).
9. The ten horns are ten kings or powers (ch. 17:12).
10. The many waters are nations (ch. 17:15).
11. The woman is a city exercising paramount authority (ch. 17:18).
12. The lake of fire is the second death (ch. 20:14).
13. The New Jerusalem is the Bride, the Lamb's wife (ch. 21:9, 10).

Here, then, we have a Divine solution of the enigma, not, indeed, sufficient to disclose all its import to the world at large, but enough to guide the servants of God in their humble and prayerful search into the meaning of the apocalyptic imagery and to show them the lines on which their inquiries should proceed. The key is in their hands.

I can hardly conclude this paper better than by appending the following extract from Sir Isaac Newton's "Observations on the Prophecies," wherein he gives a general indication of the way in which the symbols of the prophetic word should be interpreted: "When a beast or man is put for a kingdom, his parts and qualities are put for the analogous parts and qualities of the kingdom; as the head of a beast, for the great men who precede and govern; the eyes for men of understanding and policy; a new dignity is signified by a new name; moral or civil qualifications, by garments; honor and glory, by splendid apparel; royal dignity, by purple or scarlet, or by a crown; a Council of a kingdom, by its image," etc.

KEPT BY THE POWER OF GOD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Dec. 10. I. Peter 1:1-5; John 17: 11-15.

NO declaration could be more encouraging to a timid Christian than the one the apostle makes in assuring him that he is kept by the power of God. It is as if a blind man hearing the sound of swiftly approaching wheels, and not knowing whether at any moment he may be hurled to the ground and crushed, were told by some friendly voice that between the place where he is standing and the road where the vehicles are, there is a strong fence. Another illustration once comforted a Christian sufferer who was much distressed by apprehensions of the future. As he lay on his couch one summer morning he saw a butterfly fluttering in his room near the window. It flew about as if in terror and tried to make its escape, but, the window being closed, it could not. The observer saw that the cause of the butterfly's terror was a bird outside the window who darted now and again at the butterfly, but was prevented catching it by the glass. Neither creature seemed to understand that the glass prevented the butterfly being caught, but the man, who watched them both, knew that the butterfly was quite safe and that its terror was needless. He thought that probably the angels watching him and men like him, might have the same feeling, knowing well that the enemy of souls could never touch one who was kept by the power of God. Without this revelation, there is abundant reason for fear. Every one who knows his own heart, is conscious of its weakness, its tendency to evil and its liability to yield under pressure of temptation. It may not yield now, but at some future time, it may prove a traitor. As he reads of Peter's fall, of the trials of persecution which have befallen other men, he feels that he is not of the stuff of which martyrs are made and wonders if he will be able to bear such trials as may fall to his lot. To the young Christian, especially, whose life is all before him, there thoughts are often the cause of disquietude. Dreading above all things disloyalty to Christ, he fears that in some moment of weakness or under the pressure of some sudden temptation he may fall. To all such men there is infinite encouragement in this assurance that they will be kept, or guarded, by the power of God. Relying on that almighty power, what reason is there for apprehension? The real ground for fear consists in the temptation not to rely upon it. Those who are safe are those that depend on that power; those who are in slippery places are they who are trusting to their own power. If is he who thinketh he standeth, who is liable to fall. God does not guard those who prefer to walk alone. When a man is self-confident, is sure of himself, feels as Peter did, that though all men should deny Christ, yet would not he, the way to shame has already been entered. But to the faithful, trusting, consecrated soul who looks to God day by day for the strength and guidance that he needs, no harm can come, for he is guarded by the power of God.

THE FINEST Y. M. C. A. BUILDING IN THE WORLD.

Chicago is now able to boast that it possesses the finest Young Men's Christian Association building in the world. It has cost [illegible] and is in every respect the most [illegible] that has ever been erected. After five [illegible] toiling, the Association enters into the reward of its labors and takes possession of its stately home. It is thirteen stories in height and stands on the corner of La Salle Street and Arcade Court. Eight of the floors are reserved for Association work and the other five are, for the present, rented out as offices but will probably be eventually reclaimed by the Association as its numbers grow. There are already 2,335 members and doubtless there will be a large accession as the advantages which the new building enables the Association to offer become known. It is proposed to make it a means of mental and technical education of first class character besides aiding young men in spiritual growth and development. In addition to the ordinary benefits of a Y.M.C.A. in Bible classes, reading room, gymnasium and library there are to be classes in which competent teachers will give instruction in drawing, type-writing, shorthand, physiology, elocution, mathematics, book-keeping, singing, engineering and the French, German, Spanish and Latin languages. Other departments are to be added if there is a demand for them. The building also contains in addition to the usual auditorium, officers' rooms and the class rooms for the studies above mentioned, a restaurant, barber's shop, a storeroom for bicycles, and a photographic dark room. In short every legitimate want that a young man can have in business, or amusement is met so far as it could be foreseen by the managers and directors. Beside this gigantic building which will be the centre and headquarters of Association work in Chicago, there are seven branches in various parts of the city which are all in prosperous condition. It is very gratifying to learn that in a city, where young men are surrounded with so many temptations to evil courses, so well arranged and efficient an organization exists under religious auspices, to counteract the attractions of sin. Great credit is due to Mr. John V. Farwell, Jr., the President of the Association for his munificient gifts which with many other liberal donations from other public spirited Christian citizens have enabled the Association to secure so thorough an equipment for its work.

ADVICE TO THE B. Y. P. U.

Several important suggestions to the Baptist Young People's Unions were made at the recent New York State Convention by the Rev. F. L. Anderson of Rochester, who gave an exhaustive address on the principles, advantages, and defects of the organization. One topic that he discussed has already become a source of perplexity in many local unions. It is that of arranging for both the prayer meeting and the Christian Culture Courses. On this subject Mr. Anderson said: "If the young people intend to meet but once a week, and that for a prayer meeting, it is somewhat difficult to find a time for the Christian Culture Courses. If the young people change their prayer meeting into a class for Christian instruction, neither they nor the church can look for prayer-meeting results. It seems that it is only by meeting twice a week that the educational scheme of B. Y. B. U. can be worked. The leaders of the movement suggest home reading, home study, but practical educators know that such study, without a teacher, lacking the inspiration of a class, is usually only a very little better than nothing. Why, then, not carry B. Y. P. U. into the Snnday School? Why not, in this time of change of Sunday School methods, have classes formed to take up the Christian culture courses? But if, on consideration, this will not do, the only other alternative seems to be a forty-five minute session at the close of the weekly prayer meeting, a plan successfully carried out by some churches."

After discussing the burning question of fraternal relations Mr. Anderson said: Our conclusion is that in almost all our societies the Y. P. S. C. E. organization should be retained with all its rich interdenominational fellowships and all its approved machinery, but that to this should be added the culture courses and the associational, State, and national affiliations of the B. Y. P. U.

DIRECTIONS FOR KING'S DAUGHTERS.

In view of the probability of there being during the winter many families in which there will be urgent need, owing to the wage-earners being unemployed, the Central Council of King's Daughters is urging on members of the Order, an organized system for charitable relief. The following list of practical directions has been issued to the Circles throughout the country:

1st. Let the Circles existing in the many cities and towns unite to work among the poor.

2d. Choose some central bureau at which applications for help may be made.

3d. Let each member of the Order engaged in charity work visit, investigate, and report to the Relief Committee of the United Circles upon the family she has visited.

4th. The Relief Committee should meet daily at regular hours, so that help to the needy need not be delayed.

5th. Let Circles engaged in making garments for distribution unite in storing garments, to be held ready to meet the demands of the Relief Committees of their town Union of Circles.

6th. Circles existing where there are none of the dependent poor, will do good by sending their contributions to the Tenement House Committee, 70 Madison Street, New York City.

7th. Individual members are earnestly requested to offer their services as "friendly visitors" to the Societies of Organized Charity in the large cities. Those in New York City are requested to send their names and addresses to Kate Bond, 230 West Fifty-ninth street.

C. E. CONVENTION IN NEW S. WALES.

The visit of President F. E. Clark to the Southern Hemisphere gave an impetus to Christian Endeavor work in the Colonies that will not soon lose its force. The United Society has just received a report of a convention of the societies of New South Wales which, when the report left, had just been held at Sydney. "The meeting," says the writer, "was most enthusiastic, and evidently the power and presence of the Spirit was realized. The secretary, Mr. George Gray, reported an increase in the number of societies and members, during the year, of nearly two hundred per cent. Last year there were forty-eight Young People's societies and five Junior societies, with a total membership of 1,650. This year there were 124 Young People's societies and twenty-four Junior societies, a total of 148, with a membership of 4,400. The committee, in preparing the programme, had striven to weave the thought of 'loyalty' through the convention, and following the president's address three masterly speeches were given on 'Loyalty to Christ,' by Rev. John Walker (Presbyterian); 'Loyalty to the Church,' by Rev. Geo. Campbell (Congregationalist); and 'Loyalty to the Brethren,' by Rev. F. Duesbury (Methodist). At the consecration service loving and enthusiastic greetings were received from the other Colonies,—and as heartily responded to. Resolutions were carried with enthusiasm, reaffirming the Endeavor principles, and then came the roll-call. Society after society was called, until the one hundred and twenty-four were gone over, and each reaffirmed their consecration 'for Christ and the church.'"

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Hope Baptist Church, New York, has undertaken to hold services of song in the Blind Asylum regularly through the winter.

The number of Christian Endeavor Societies throughout the world enrolled prior to November 1 was 28,071, with an aggregate membership of 1,684,260. The societies in the United States were 24,577.

Bishop Hill, of Western Equatorial Africa, and his colored coadjutor, Bishop Olnwole, are making a tour of the Y. M. C. Associations in England to urge the claims of that field on young Christian workers.

At the recent Christian Endeavor Convention of Minnesota, 635 societies reported, of which the largest number are connected with Congregational churches. During the year no less than 760 associate members had joined the church and passed into the active list.

Eminent speakers are already being engaged for the Jubilee of Young Men's Christian Associations to be held in London next June. Promises to attend and take part in the meetings have come from the Bishop of Ripon, the Dean of Norwich, and Prof. Webb-Peploe.

The local union of Christian Endeavor at Wilmington, Del., has decided to form an association to furnish coffee and sandwiches to needy men in the city on Sunday mornings. Evangelistic services are to be conducted at the same time when these breakfasts are given.

President Clark, of the Christian Endeavor Society, proposes that the Societies unite in a grand effort to raise $250,000 for missions during the coming year. This money will be given through the denominational boards to which the Societies respectively belong, to be used by them, as they see fit, in extending God's kingdom. Each Society will simply report the amount raised to the United Society and hand the money to its own board.

The recent Biennial Conference of Young Women's Christian Associations at Buffalo, N. Y., showed a gratifying extension of the movement. One hundred and ten delegates accepted the invitation of the local association. It was decided to hold the next conference in Brooklyn, N. Y. The following officers of the International Board were elected: President, Mrs. C. R. Springer, St. Louis, Mo.; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. C. N. Judson, Brooklyn and Miss M. A. Stimson, New York; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. John Duncan, Louisville, Ky.; Recording Secretary, Miss M. E. True, Chicago; Treasurer, Mrs. Levi T. Scofield, Cleveland.

Early Thanksgivings.

How they were Celebrated in New England Two and a Half Centuries ago.

THE first New England Thanksgiving was not observed by either Plymouth Pilgrim or Boston Puritan. "Gyving God thanks" for safe arrival and many other liberal blessings was first heard on New England shores from the lips of the Popham colonists at Mohegan, in the Thanksgiving service of the Church of England. Thus writes Alice Morse Earle, in her delightful book on Customs and Fashions in Old New England.* Days set apart for thanksgiving were known in Europe before the Reformation, and were in frequent use by Protestants afterward, especially in the Church of England, where they were a fixed custom long before they were in England. One wonders that the Puritans, hating so fiercely the customs and set days of the Established Church, should so quickly have appointed a Thanksgiving Day. But the first New England Thanksgiving was not a day of religious observance, it was a day of recreation. Those who fancy all Puritans, and especially all Pilgrims, to have been sour, morose, and gloomy men, should read this account of the first Thanksgiving week (not day) in Plymouth. It was written on December 11, 1621, by Edward Winslow to a friend in England:

> Our harvest being gotten in, our governor sent foure men on fowling that we might, after a special manner, rejoice together after we had gathered the fruits of our labors. They four killed as much fowl as, with a little help beside, served the company almost a week. At which times among other recreations, we exercised our arms, many of the Indians coming amongst us, and among the rest their greatest king, Massasoyt with some ninety men, whom for three days we entertained and feasted, and they went out and killed five deer which they brought and bestowed on our governor, and upon the captains and others.

As Governor Bradford specified that during that autumn "beside water foule there was great store of wild turkies," one can have the satisfaction of feeling sure that at that first Pilgrim Thanksgiving, our forefathers and foremothers had turkeys. Thus fared the Pilgrims better at their Thanksgiving than did their English brothers, for turkeys were far from plentiful in England at that date. Though there were but fifty-five English to eat the Pilgrim Thanksgiving feast, there were "partakers in plenty," and the ninety sociable Indian visitors did not come empty-handed, but joined fraternally in provision for the feast, and probably also in the games.

In 1630, on February 22d, as Miss Earle relates in her book, the first public Thanksgiving was held in Boston by the Bay Colony, in gratitude for the safe arrival of food-bearing and friend-bringing ships. On November 4, 1631, Winthrop wrote again: "We kept Thanksgiving day in Boston." From that time till 1684 there were at least twenty-two public Thanksgiving days appointed in Massachusetts—about one in two years; but it was not a regular biennial festival. In 1675, a time of deep gloom through the many and widely separated attacks from the fierce savages, there was no public Thanksgiving celebrated in either Massachusetts or Connecticut. It is difficult to state when the feast became a fixed annual observance in New England. In the year 1742, there were two Thanksgiving Days.

Rhode Islanders paid little heed in early days to Thanksgiving—at any rate, to days set by the Massachusetts authorities. Governor Andros savagely prosecuted more than one Rhode Islander who calmly worked all day long on the day appointed for giving thanks. In Boston, William Veazie was set in the pillory in the market-place for ploughing on the Thanksgiving Day of June 18, 1696. Connecticut people, though just as pious and as prosperous as the Bay colonists, do not appear to have been as grateful, and had considerable trouble at times to "pick vppon a'day" for Thanksgiving; and the festival was not regularly observed there till 1716.

Many funny stories are told of the early Thanksgiving Days, such as the town of Colchester calmly ignoring the governor's appointed day and observing their own festival a week later, in order to allow time for the arrival, by sloop from New York, of a hogshead of molasses for pies. Another is recounted of a farmer losing his cask of Thanksgiving molasses out of his cart as he reached the top of a steep hill, and of its rolling swiftly down till split in twain by its fall. His helpless discomfiture and his wife's acidity of temper and diet are comically told. There is in the possession of the Massachusetts Historical Society a broadside announcing a Thanksgiving for victory in King Philip's War; and during the following year, 1677, the first regular Thanksgiving proclamation was printed.

The picture on this page representing the first Thanksgiving celebrated by the Pilgrims in 1621, furnishes an excellent idea of the rude surroundings and hearty hospitality of the colonists. Their feast was held in an unpainted log meeting house, built with clay filled in between the chinks and a straw-thatched roof and wooden floor. It was not until after the third Thanksgiving, however, that the custom was fairly established and the day came to be hailed as the great national festival.

THE FIRST THANKSGIVING, PLYMOUTH, 1621.

The Pilgrims had King Massasoit and many of his Indians as guests.

In Middle Life.

You who are in middle life need counsel and admonition probably quite as much as the young. You are the youth whom your friends assured fifteen or twenty years ago of power and fruition; is it not worth while to ask if you have found either or both? Are you satisfied with your aims and work this present year as representing life's best fruitage? Are you bending your matured powers to the accomplishment of ends so worthy that the products of your labor shall outlast these fleeting days of time, and live on through the ages of eternity? How much are you worth—no, not in stocks and bonds, but in powers and pleasures, to your church-to your community, to your growing children? Your season of full power is necessarily short. Make the most it you can.

Princess and Needle-girl.

Just before last Christmas, the Princess of Wales saw a delicate-looking young girl standing waiting in the hall of Marlbourgh House. She had brought some little garments for children, which the princess had ordered. The princess took the girl, who was quite ignorant of who her conductor was, into her own room, examined the garments, and praising the neatness of the work, asked who did them. The girl replied that she had made them. She had an invalid mother to support, and she hoped by becoming an expert that she might be able to save enough to purchase a machine of her own and earn bread for her mother. The princess ordered a basket to be brought, with refreshments, asked the girl's address, and gave her the basket to take home. On Christmas morning what was the girl's astonishment to receive a handsome new sewing-machine, with a paper attached to it bearing the words, "A Christmas gift from Alexandra." It was a graceful gift and showed that kind hearts can be found in palaces as well as in the humbler abodes of the peope.

GRANDMOTHER'S BIBLE.

SO you've brought me this costly Bible,
With its covers so grand and gay;
You thought I must need a new one,
On my eighty-first birthday, you say;
Yes, mine is a worn-out volume;
Grown ragged and yellow with age,
With finger-prints thick on the margin—
But there's never a missing page.

Your gift is a beauty, my darling,
With its wonderful clasps of gold.
Put it carefully into the drawer;
I shall keep it till death; but the old—
Just leave it close by on the table,
And then you may bring me a light,
And I'll read a sweet psalm from its pages
To think of, if wakeful to-night.

A GRANDMOTHER'S COUNSEL.

THERE are few letters more beautiful than that written by the saintly Quakeress, Mrs. Margaret Morris, to her grand-daughter on the eve of the latter's marriage. We make these extracts from it, which are peculiarly interesting and profitable reading for young people:

"As the man who has chosen thee for the companion of his life, has given the best proof of his regard that a man can give, and as thou hast accepted his offer, I find no objection to him; but keep in mind, that it will depend much on thyself to secure his esteem and confidence, by prudent and circumspect behavior, both to him and his friends and relations, who are worthy of thy regard; study his temper, and do not suffer thyself to dispute with him on trivial matters: rather give up thy own will than provoke him to make harsh replies; scrupulously avoid every occasion that may arise or tend toward wrangling in thy home life.

"In regard to the article of expense, I trust prudence will direct thee not to go beyond thy husband's means of supplying thee. Practice frugality, which is a virtue, and avoid parsimony, which is as far from a virtue as extravagance is from economy. As neither thyself nor he are what the world calls rich, (though you have enough to begin with, and, if carefully managed, I hope, under the blessings of heaven, it will enable you to live comfortably, and that you will have something for the poor, who I hope, will not be forgotten by you), I entreat thee, my dear, not to aim at living in a high style; be content to live in a plain, frugal manner, agreeable to the way in which thou hast been brought up.

"In regard to thy conduct to servants, treat them kindly, rather as humble friends dependent on thee than as menials, who have no ties of love or gratitude to bind them. Maintain thy own dignity as head of a family without becoming too familiar with thy servants; this may be done without haughtiness, pride or indecorous language.

"I do entreat thee not to launch out into extravagance in dress; it shows a weak and vain mind to be continually changing one's dress as the fashions change."

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONFESSION AND FORGIVENESS.

NEVER sun shone fairer on a mid-summer morning than on the day of Monk's wedding. At the Park they were early astir, for the wedding was fixed for half-past ten. Yolante and Cissy were both to be bridesmaids together with Geraldine Wyndham and Cicely Northesk. So they started early for the Grange and nothing save Guy's absence threw any cloud on the day's festivities.

Humphrey Dangerfield was the only one of the party who was not going to be present at the wedding. Although he had thrown off a great many invalid habits he was still unable to bear fatigue and excitement and as plenty remained to be done at the Park he decided to remain at home so that his mother might go with a mind undisturbed.

And so it was to Humphrey that a frightened servant bore the news that the Squire's horse had come home in a terrible state and that one of the hostlers who had gone to Fordingham to make inquiries, had come back with the news that Mr. Guy was lying not two miles away by the roadside looking like dead.

It was indeed a terrible piece of news, but Humphrey's presnce of mind did not desert him. When he found out that Guy was already being transported home, he summoned the old housekeeper, who luckily was not gone to the wedding, and bade her prepare his former rooms, which were the coolest and quietest in the house.

Hardly had all this been accomplished before the conveyance borrowed for the purpose from a house near to the place where the accident had happened, drove up to the door with its ghastly burden.

Humphrey looked at the clock in the tower and saw that the hands indicated a few minutes after half-past ten. Beckoning to a groom who stood by—a sharp lad, who was to be trusted, he said, "You ride across to the church where the wedding is going on, and stay quiet until the ceremony is over—which it will be just about by the time you get there. When the party goes to the vestry to write the names, you just go quietly to Mr. Fulk, and tell him that Mr. Guy has come home, and has come home ill, and that I want him and Mr. Northesk here immediately. Don't say anything about an accident, or let the bride and bridegroom hear anything to upset them. Leave Mr. Fulk to find a reason for going away, and as there will be plenty of carriages about you will have no difficulty in getting back quick. If there is any delay, put Mr. Northesk on the horse and ask him to ride as hard as he can."

The groom nodded, and was off to the stable-yard like a flash. The next minute he was to be seen cutting straight across the park in the direction of the nearest gate. Humphrey breathed a sigh of relief, and then slowly mounted the stairs in the wake of the men who were carrying their helpless burden.

Guy had just sunk into a heavy slumber when the rapid beat of horses' hoofs up the drive told that the groom had accomplished his errand. Humphrey looked out to see Fulk and Geoffrey galloping up to the house together, the former mounted on a rough steed, plainly borrowed from some farmer, and within two minutes they were in the room itself. Guy woke up at the sound of their entrance, and greeted them with a smile.

"He's had an accident, and has broken his arm, and so far as we can tell has been lying in a ditch all night," said Humphrey to the two friends in a low tone.

Geoffrey examined Guy intently, not putting any questions, but feeling his limbs, counting his pulse, and listening to his breathing. The patient had sunk into a sort of torpor that looked like sleep, and the setting of the arm only partially aroused him, and made him ask a few questions as to how it could have happened. Geoffrey would not let him talk, and he sank into torpor again.

"I should be sorry to form a precipitate opinion," Geoffrey said in response to Fulk's inquiring look, "but to-day there is no time to wait for a consultation. My father will be here shortly, and we will hear what he says. But my own opinion is that there is mischief to the spine as well. And what the effects of the exposure alone may be with one of his constitution no one can tell till a few days have passed."

This was Geoffrey's way of breaking the sad news. He knew that his own opinion was only too well founded. There was really never any hope from the first. The violent fall had resulted in spinal injury and internal strain beyond the power of surgeon's skill to set right, and the long exposure brought on those pulmonary symptoms to which Guy was but too prone, and towards which he had such a strongly inherited tendency.

But the danger was not immediate. He might live many months yet, and enjoy a very fair amount of comfort before the final summons came. There was little acute suffering, and Guy's elastic temperament and natural buoyancy of disposition did not desert him now. His room was a sort of centre and gathering place for the whole family, and he was always pleased to see visitors, and to hear everything that was going on. He was greatly interested in the news of Norman's sudden engagement, which, however, did not seem as sudden to him as it had done to many others,and he received the affianced couple with warm congratulations when they came to see him, and gave to Norman the superfluous yet gratifying intelligence that he had won a treasure for himself.

"I ought to know—and to know better than you," he said with his vivid smile, for I have had opportunities of watching her that you have not. I didn't live in that old house by the river for nothing all those months."

For some weeks Mrs. Dangerfield went about much as usual, utterly declining to take a serious view of Guy's state, cheerful in his presence, solicitous for his comfort, sending excellent accounts of him to Monk and Joyce, and busying herself over her own plans, and the removal to town which had now been definitely settled upon. One of her most pressing anxieties of the present was whether Guy would be fit to move in time for Monk and Joyce to take possession of their own house, and it was on putting some such question as this to Yolante that the truth to which she had so sedulously closed her eyes was forced resolutely upon her.

"Mother, mother,how can you speak so? Are you quite blind? or is it you will not see? Do you not know that he is dying—not actually at this moment, but slowly fading out of life? They all know it, and have known it from the first—the doctors and Fulk, and everyone, I think, with eyes in their head. He knows it himself I am certain. O mother, mother, mother, will you let him die without telling him the truth, and getting his forgiveness?"

Mrs. Dangerfield started to her feet, and the colour faded from her face. Since that attack the previous autumn she had never quite recovered her self-control. "Dying—Guy dying—Yolante you do not mean it. It is not true. Dying—and for Monk's sake. I will not believe it—I will not."

"It is true, mother, it is only too true. Guy will never be better again. It is only the question of a few weeks, or possibly months. And it might come almost any time. Mother, if you do not believe me ask those who know. But it is all true—too true. O mother, mother, have pity on me and on yourself. If he dies without knowing all, if we never beg his forgiveness whilst he lives, I shall never know a moment's peace in years to come."

Yolante was actually on her knees before her mother, but she need not have feared repulse at this moment. Mrs. Dangerfield was agitated almost beyond the power of speech, but there was no longer any wish for concealment in her heart.

"We will go to him, Yolante, we will go to him to-night—together. He shall know the whole truth at last. Perhaps he will be able to forgive us ere he dies. At least he shall know that all is his, and that by his grandfather's wish and deed, by no mere freak of chance,as he has always believed."

It was late that same night that Mrs. Dangerfield and her daughter sought the quiet room where the patient lay. The window was open to the broad and peaceful moonlight that flooded the apartment, and Guy lay looking out upon the world of ebony and silver with a strangely peaceful smile upon his face. He was generally left alone at nights as he required little attention, and an electric bell close at hand would bring Fulk to his side in a minute. He was fond of solitude as well as of company,and though he slept but fitfully the nights were seldom long to him.

"Yolante—Aunt Clare," he said, greeting them with surprise,"is anything the matter? Is it not very late?"

"It is late," said Mrs. Dangerfield in a strange muffled voice, "but we wanted to see you when you were alone, and some things are said more easily in the dark than in the light. O, Guy, Guy, we have come to speak, and now I know not how to begin. But believe me I have been punished for my sin. How bitter the punishment has been no one but myself can ever know."

Greatly surprised Guy raised himself slightly and looked earnestly at his aunt with questioning eyes. She could not bear that clear, luminous gaze. She sank shuddering into a chair beside the bed, covering her face with her hands. Yolante was on her knees at the bedside. She was the calmer outwardly of the two.

"Tell him, Yolante—tell him all. I cannot do it—I cannot."

Yolante had nerved herself for this, and hers was the impetuous nature that finds relief in speech. She told the whole story, her mother suffering nothing to be left out. She told it clearly and concisely, and with the graphic energy inspired by the tense state of her mind. And Guy lay and listened, his calm face changing very little, his eyes fixed on the moon-lit world without, a faint shadowy smile hovering sometimes over his lips. Presently as the narrative drew to a close, he put out his hand, and took that of his aunt.

"I wish you had told me," he said softly, "I never wanted the property—I should have hated to displace Monk. Dear Aunt Clare, you saved me a great deal of perplexity, and Monk too. Of course in one way I am very sorry. It can never be right to do evil that good may come, and I am so sorry that it made a sort of cloud between us. I felt that there was one, when I could not understand why it was. But I am not sorry for anything else—indeed I am not."

Yolante was sobbing convulsively. It was seldom indeed that she gave way, but she had done so under the strain of deep remorse.

"O, Guy, Guy, and to think how I have hated you, and tried to injure you, and you all the time have loved Monk better than any of us—and I was jealous because I thought you stood in his path—or might do so if you had the chance."

Guy smiled, and touched Yolante's head with his hand. "Don't cry," he said, almost as if they were still children together. "I'm only so sorry it has been such a weight and a nightmare to you. Of course I know it was all for Monk's sake—do you think I should be angry at anything done for him? I wish you had told me."

"And can you really forgive?"

"It does not seem as if there was anything to forgive, but if there is of course I do a thousand times over. Do I not owe everything to you? Have I had anyone else to love all these years? We have been like brothers and sisters always. There ought never to be any need of forgiveness."

O, Guy, Guy—"

Yolante could bear no more. She rose quickly, bent over Guy with one passionate kiss, and hurried from the room, her mother following after a few brief words which brought the kindling smile into Guy's face.

* * * * * * *

Just one scene more and I have done.

The place is still Guy's quiet room. The day is the last of the old year.

One look in Guy's face would be enough to tell an experienced eye that he had not many days to live, that the silver cord was almost loosened and the golden bowl broken. He had changed very much since we saw him last, and though he still lay upon his couch by the sitting-room fire and those about him hardly realised that he was so soon to leave them, he knew it well himself. He had got beyond the reach of doubts and fears now. Nothing could touch him, or shake the calm that had enfolded him. He hardly knew how the hours went by, and whether it were night or day: but he realised that this was the last day of the last year he should ever spend on earth, and he would not move from where he lay in the pleasant fire-lit room: but said he would watch the old year out and the new one in with Monk and Joyce beside him: and it was in that quiet hour, the last of the dying year, that the whole story of the Dangerfield inheritance was told in its entirety to the young husband and wife who reigned over its broad acres.

It was calmly told, for Mrs. Dangerfield had rehearsed the scene too many times to be unnerved at the last: and it was even calmlylistened to,for there was that in Guy's face that checked any outbreak either of grief or indignation. Monk's face only grew very grave and set, and Joyce quivered with excitement and drew very near to Guy's side as the strange narrative proceeded: but he lay still, never interrupting by a word or sign, with a dreamy smile in his eyes, and when Monk leaned over him at last, and said in a low, hoarse voice,

"O Guy, Guy, if I had only known. Why did you keep it from me?" he looked up with the old lighting of the eyes and said, "I could not bear the thought of taking your place. It has been so much happier for us all as it has been. Dear old Monk, you must be glad too. You know it was my doing all along—I mean the keeping of the secret, and you must never blame anybody else for it. I cannot tell you how wretched it would have made me if I had been compelled to take your place. I have always been the younger brother, and have been so happy all my life. And whatever had been before, this would have been the end of it, and it has been so much better to have avoided all confusion. Say that you are not angry with us. It was the only secret I ever kept from you."

They all knew for whom he was really pleading, and Monk turned round and put his arm about the drooping form of his mother. She clung to him and whispered some words they could not hear: but the deep-toned answer was distinctly audible.

"Between mother and son there can be no question of forgiveness—at least not from son towards mother."

There was a moment of deep silence whilst Monk turned to Guy, and took both his hands in one firm, close clasp. No words passed between the two, and none were needed. The deep love of a lifetime—the love that was beyond that of brothers, needed no help from feeble words in which to express itself. And the long, solemn silence was broken by the full tones of the tower clock as it pealed forth the hour of midnight. And then through the clear, frosty air came the pealing of the bells from the church, ringing out their message of joy and welcome as the new born year stole silently in the wake of the one which had been just closed.

Guy lifted his head and pointed to the window with a smile, and Monk understanding the unspoken request walked forward and threw it open for a moment. Joyce followed him, and his mother stood not far behind and clear through the star-lit night rang out the sweet chime.

Guy had closed his eyes. The happy smile was still on his face with which he had greeted the New Year's bells, his eyes fixed upon Monk's face.

"He is asleep," said Joyce, noting the deep repose of the expression; but Monk started, and drew nearer.

But Joyce was right. Guy was asleep—only the sleep was one from which he would never awake till the years have ceased their long cycle, and the great day of Eternity is breaking over the vanishing hills of time. Guy had entered into his inheritance—the inheritance that fadeth not away.

A Ferry Over the Jordan.

The Associations of the Famous River of Palestine, its Fords, and its Miracles.

TRAVELLERS speak of the Jordan as an insignificant river and the epithet is deserved, if size alone be the measure of significance. Compared with the great rivers of this and other lands, the one river of Palestine is only a small stream. From its source at the base of hoary Hermon, where it is born of perpetual snows, to its mouth at the Dead Sea, is only two hundred miles and in a straight line is only one hundred and thirty-six miles. Its ordinary width averages not more than a hundred and twenty feet, save when in the spring of the year it is swollen and rises to the level of the rocky channel through which it flows. No important city ever stood on its banks; it is not navigable and it falls into a stagnant sea which has no port. Yet, no river on earth is so rich in hallowed associations. Its name is familiar to thousands who have scarcely heard of the Rhine, the Tiber, the Thames, or the Mississippi. The cause is not far to seek. Connected with its waters and in its immediate neighborhood occurred events of world-wide interest and its name is inseparably associated with those of the inspired men whom God appointed to reveal his will to the whole world. It formed the eastern boundary of the Promised Land and the crossing of it has more than once been more momentous to the world than was Cæsar's crossing of the Rubicon. The passage has become the type of the great change, which is dreaded by every man who has not the assurance of a welcome and an eternal inheritance in the heavenly Canaan.

The illustration on this page is a reproduction of a photograph taken near Hajlah, the ancient Bethabara. A caravan is crossing the river in a kared, the primitive flat-bottomed boat of the country. Its motor power is furnished by a rope seen in the picture. The principle is the same as that of the cable-cars with us. An endless rope, long enough to reach across the river, passes over a pulley-wheel affixed to the spiles seen on the right of the picture. The kared is attached to the rope by a grip, and when its load is on board, men standing on the bank opposite to the one where the spiles are, pull on the rope and so draw it across. Formerly, a few miles higher up the river, a noble bridge of Roman workmanship once spanned it two miles below the Lake of Gennesaret, but it is now in ruins. Only one bridge now remains, a quaint structure of one large pointed arch flanked by a double tier of smaller arches which support the roadway on each side. There are several places on the river between the lake and the Dead Sea where sand banks render it fordable and doubtless these are the places where the Jordan has most frequently been crossed in ancient times. Abraham must have crossed the river so, when in obedience to the divine command he left his home in Ur of the Chaldees to go into the land of Canaan. Later, when he separated from Lot and gave his nephew the choice of a region for settlement, Lot chose the plain of the Jordan, then "well-watered everywhere," but now a dry sterile district, bearing the marks of the fire of God which destroyed the two vicious cities. Jacob crossed the Jordan when he fled by his mother's advice to escape Esau. In that night of awful suspense, when he knew that the morning would bring him face to face with his injured and exasperated brother, at the head of four hundred men, he recalled how some twenty years before, with only his staff he had "crossed this Jordan." That night of wrestling and prayer was passed near the Jordan, on the banks of the little tributary river Jabbok which rises to the east of it. Jacob sent his cattle and family over the stream and remained alone to pray. It was to the fords of the Jordan that the men of Jericho went in pursuit of the spies (Jos. 2:7) and it was at the fords that Ehud and later, Gideon, slaughtered the enemies of their nation.

The southern fords which are nearer Jerusalem were probably those used by David when he crossed the river to fight the Syrians (II. Samuel 10: 17.) He crossed it again under more mournful circumstances, as he fled from Absalom; and the unnatural son crossed it when he followed his father in pursuit. After the battle when David returned in triumph a ferry-boat was provided for his household (II. Samuel 19: 18.) Another crossing is formally chronicled as a feat worthy of permanent record (I. Chron. 12: 15), indicating that the passage was not unattended with danger. Three times was the crossing of the river an occasion for miraculous interposition. When the Israelites under Joshua crossed near Jericho, we are told (Josh. 3: 16) that the waters from above stood on a heap, while below they continued to run, leaving the passage dry. Again on the last day of Elijah's life on earth we are told (II. Kings 2: 8) that Jordan was again crossed through a miraculous power, as he and Elisha went eastward toward Jericho. A little later, and probably at the same spot, Elisha learned by the like miracle that his prayer for the spirit of Elijah had been granted as the waters separated at the stroke of the mantle in his hands, as they had done when it was in the hands of Elijah. It was in Jordan, too, that Naaman experienced his miraculous healing of his leprosy, after he had overcome his repugnance to bathing in a stream so much inferior to the rivers of his own country. In New Testament history the supreme interest connected with the Jordan is the baptism of Jesus. No one can now tell the exact spot where it took place, but close study leads to the belief that it was at the place already famous as the scene of the three miracles. In commemoration of the event Christian pilgrims from all lands annually visit the Jordan and bathe about Easter time in large numbers at the spot.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE MISSION OF THE FROST.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Job 37: 10: "By the breath of God frost is given."

NOTHING is more embarrassing to an organist or pianist than to put his finger on a key of the instrument and have it make no response. Though all the other keys are in full play, that one silence destroys the music. So in the great cathedral of nature if one part fails to praise the Lord the harmony is halted and lost. While fire and hail, snow and vapor, respond to the touch of inspiration, if the frost made no utterance, the orchestral rendering would be hopelessly damaged and the harmony forever incomplete. I am more glad than I can tell that the white key of the frost sounds forth as mightily as any of the other keys, and when David touches it in the Psalms, it sounds forth the words: "He scattereth the hoar frost like ashes," and when Job touches it in my text, it resounds with the words: "By the breath of God frost is given."

As no one seems disposed to discuss the mission of Frost, depending on Divine help, I undertake it. This is the first Sabbath of winter. The leaves are down. The warmth has gone out of the air. The birds have made their winged march southward. The landscape has been scarred by the autumnal equinox. The huskers have rifled the corn shocks. The night sky has shown the usual meteoric restlessness of November. Three seasons of the year are past and the fourth, and last, has entered. Another element now comes in to bless and adorn and instruct the world. It is the frost. The palaces of this king are far up in the Arctic. Their walls are glittering congelation. Windsor Castles and Tuilleries and Winter Palaces and Kenilworths and Alhambras of ice. Temples with pendant chandeliers of ice. Thrones of iceberg, on which eternal silence reigns. Theatres on whose stage eternal cold dramatizes eternal winter. Pillars of ice. Arches of ice. Crowns of ice. Chariots of ice. Sepulchres of ice. Mountains of ice. Dominions of ice. Eternal frigidity! From those hard, white, burnished portals King Frost descends, and waves his silvery sceptre over our temperate zone. You will soon hear his heel on the skating pond. You already feel his breath in the night wind. By most considered an enemy coming here to benumb and hinder and slay, I shall show you that the frost is a friend, with benediction Divinely pronounced, and charged and surcharged with lessons potent, beneficent and tremendous. The Bible seven times alludes to the frost, and we must not ignore it. "By the breath of God frost is given."

First, I think of Frost as a painter. He begins his work on the leaves and continues it on the window-panes. With palette covered with all manner of colors in his left hand, and pencil of crystal in his right hand, he sits down before humblest bush in the latter part of September, and begins the sketching of the leaves. Now he puts upon the foliage a faint pallor, and then a touch of brown, and then a hue of orange, and last a flame of fire. The beech and ash and oak are turned first into sunrises and then into sunsets of vividness and splendor. All the leaves are penciled one by one, but sometimes a whole forest in the course of a few days shows great velocity of work. Weenix, the Dutch painter, could make in a summer day three portraits of life size, but the frost in ten days can paint ten mountains in life size. It makes the last days of an autumnal wood the days of its chiefest glory. Luxembourgs in the Adirondacks. Louvres in the Sierra Nevadas. Vaticans in the White Mountains. The work of other painters you must see in the right light to fully appreciate, but the paintings of the Frost in all lights are enchanting, and from the time when the curtain of the morning lifts to the time when the curtain of the night drops. Michael Angelo put upon one ceiling his representation of the Last Judgment, but the Frost represents universal conflagration upon three thousand miles of stretched-out grandeur. Leonardo da Vinci put upon a few feet of canvas our Lord's "Last Supper" for all ages to admire, but the Frost puts the gleaming chalices of the imperial glories of the Last Supper of the dying year on the heights and lengths and breadths of the Alleghanies. When Titian first gazed upon a sketch of Correggio he was wrought up into such ecstasy that he cried out: "If I were not Titian I would be Correggio," and so great and overpowering are the autumnal scenes of our American forests that one force of nature might well exclaim to another: "If I were not the sunlight I would be the frost." Rugendas, the German painter, suffering from weakness in his right hand, laboriously learned to paint with his left hand, but the Frost paints with both hands, and has in them more skill than all the Rembrandts and Rubens and Wests and Poussins and Albert Durers and Paul Veroneses and Claudes gathered in one long art gallery.

But the door of that great museum of autumnal coloring is now closed for a twelvemonth, and another spectacle, just as wonderful, is about to open. I put you on the alert, and ask you to put your children on the alert. Tired of working on the leaves, the frost will soon turn to the window panes. You will soon waken on a cold morning and find that the windows of your home have during the night been adorned with curves, with coronets, with exquisiteness, with pomp, with almost supernatural spectacle. Then you will appreciate what my text says, as it declares, "By the breath of God frost is given." You will see on the window pane, traced there by the frost, whole gardens of beauty, ferns, orchids, daffodils, heliotropes, china asters, fountains, statues, hounds on the chase, roebucks plunging into the stream, battle scenes with dying and dead, catafalques of kings, triumphal processions, and as the morning sun breaks through you will see cities on fire, and bombardment with bursting shell, and illuminations as for some great victory, coronations, and angels on the wing. All night long, while you were sleeping, the frost was working, and you ought not let the warmth obliterate the scene until you have admired it, studied it, absorbed it, set it up in your memory for perpetual refreshment, and realized the force and magnitude and intensity of my text: "By the breath of God frost is given." Oh, what a God we have! What resources are implied by the fact that he is able to do that by the finger of the frost fifty times in one winter and on a hundred thousand window panes for thousands of winters. The great art galleries of Venice and Naples and Dresden are carefully guarded, and governments protect them, for, once lost, they can never be reproduced, but God sets up in the Royal Galleries of the Frost pictures such as no human art could ever produce, hundreds of thousands of them, only for four or five hours, and then rubs them out, making the place clear for a display just as magnificent the next morning. No one but a God could afford to do that. It would bankrupt everything but infinity and omnipotence.

Standing here between the closed doors of the pictured woods and the opening doors of the transfigured window glass, I want to cure my folly and your folly of longing for glorious things in the distance, while we neglect appreciation of glorious things close by. "O, if I could only go and see the factories of lace at Brussels," says some one. Why, within twenty feet of where you awaken some December morning, you will see richer lace interwoven for your window panes by Divine fingers. "O, if I could see the factories of silk at Lyons," says some one. Why, without leaving your home, on the north side of your own house on Christmas morning you may see where the Lord has spun silken threads about your windows this way and that. Embroideries such as no one but God can work. Alas, for this glorification of the distant and this belittling of the close-by! This crossing of oceans and paying a high admission in expenses to look at that which is not half as well done as something we can see by crossing our own room, and free of charge. This praising of Raphaels hundreds of years gone, when the greater Raphael, the Frost, will soon be busy at the entrances to your own home.

Next I speak of the Frost as a physician. Standing at the gates of New York harbor autumn before last, the frost drove back the cholera saying, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther." From Memphis and New Orleans and Jacksonville, he smote the fever plague till it reeled back and departed. The Frost is a physician that doctors cities, nations and continents. He medicines the world. Quinine for malaria, antifebrile for typhoids, sulphonal for sleeplessness, antispasmodic for disturbed nerves, but in all thereapeutics there is no remedy like the small pellets prepared by the cold, and no physician so skillful or so mighty as the frost. Scotland has had great physicians, but her greatest doctors have been the Abernethies and Abercrombies that have come down over the Highlands horsed on the north wind. England has had her great physicians, but her greatest doctors have been the Andrew Clarkes and the Mackenzies who appeared the first night the fields of England were rimed with white. America has had its great physicians, but her greatest doctors have been the Willard Parkers and Valentine Motts who landed from bleak skies while our fingers were benumbed and our ears tingled with the cold. O, it is high time that you add another line to your liturgy. It is high time that you make an addendum to your prayers. It is high time that you enlarge the catalogue of your blessings. Thank God for frost! It is the best of all germicides. It is the only hope in bacteriology. It is the medicament of continents. It is the salvation of our temperate zone. It is the best tonic that God ever gave the human race. It is the only strong stimulant which has no reaction. The best commentary on it I had while walking near here one cool morning with my brother John, who spent the most of his life as a missionary in China, and in that part of it where there are no frosts. He said there was a tingling gladness in his nerves indescribable, and an almost intoxication of delight from the fact that it was the first time for years he had felt the sensation of frost. We complain of it, we scold it, we frown upon it, when we ought to be stirred by it to gratitude, and hoist it on a doxology.

But I must go further and speak of the Frost as a jeweler. As the snow is frozen rain, so the frost is frozen dew. God transforms it from a liquid into a crystal. It is the dew glorified. In the 38th chapter of that inspired drama, the Book of Job, God says to the inspired dramatist, with ecstatic interrogation: "The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?" God there asks Job if he knows the parentage of the frost. He enquires about its pedigree. He suggests that Job study up the frost's genealogical line. A minute before God had asked about the parentage of a rain-drop in words that years ago gave me a suggestive text for a sermon: "Hath the rain a father?" But now the Lord Almighty is catechising Job about the frost. He practically says: "Do you know its father? Do you know its mother? In what cradle of the leaves did the wind rock it? 'The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?'" He is a stupid Christian who thinks so much of the printed and bound Bible that he neglects the Old Testament of the fields, nor reads the wisdom and kindness and beauty of God written in blossoms on the orchard, in sparkles on the lake, in stars on the sky, in frost on the meadows. The greatest jeweler of all the earth is the frost. There is nothing more wonderful in all crystallography. Some morning in December a whole continent is found besprent with diamonds, the result of one night's work by this jeweler. Do you make the depreciatory remark that the frost is impermanent and will last only two or three hours? What of that? We go into London Tower and look at the Crown jewels of England, but we are in a procession that the guards keep moving on, and five minutes or less are your only opportunity of looking at those Crown jewels, but at the Crown jewels bestarred of the frost in parks and fields, you may stand to look deliberately and for hours, and no one to tell you to move on.

O, these regalias and diadems of beauty flung out of heaven! Kings and queens on celebrative days have come riding through the streets, throwing handfuls of silver and gold among the people, but the Queen of the Winter Morning is the only queen rich enough to throw pearls, and the King of Frost the only king rich enough to throw opals and sapphires and diamonds. Homer describes a necklace of amber given to Penelope, but the frost necklaces a continent. The carcanet of precious stones given to Harmonia had pinions of orange jasper and white moonstone and Indian agate, but it was a misfortune to anyone who owned or inherited it, and its history, generation after generation, was a history of disaster: but the regalia of frost is the good fortune of every morning that owns it. The imperial household of Louis XVI. could not afford the diamond necklace which had been ordered for Queen Marie Antoinette, and it was stolen and taken apart and lost, but the necklace that the frost puts on the wintry morning, though made of as many brilliants as the withered grass blades, is easily afforded by Divine opulence, and is never lost, but after its use in the coronation of the fields is taken back to heaven. O, men and women, accustomed to go into ecstasy when in foreign travel you come upon the historical gems of nations, whether the jewel be called "The Mountain of Glory," or the "Sea of Light," or "The Crown of the Moon," or "The Eye of Allah," or "The Star of Sarawak," or "The Koh-i-noor," I implead you study the jewels strewn all round your wintry home, and realize that "By the breath of God frost is given."

But I go a step further and speak of the Frost as an Evangelist, and a text of Scripture is not of much use to me unless I I can find the Gospel in it. The Israelites in the wilderness breakfasted on something that looked like frozen dew. The manna fell on the dew, and the dew evaporated and left a pulverized material, white, and looking like frost, but it was manna, and of that they ate. So now this morning, mixed with the frozen dew of my text, there is manna on which we may breakfast our souls. You say the frost kills. Yes, it kills some things, but we have already seen that it gives health and life to others. This Gospel is the savor of life unto life or of death unto death. As the frost is mighty, the Gospel is mighty. As the frost descends from heaven, the Gospel descends from heaven. By the breath of God frost is given. By the breath of God the Gospel is given. As the frost purifies, so the grace of God purifies. As the frost bestars the earth, so grace bejewels the soul. As the frost prepares for food many things that otherwise would be inedible, so the frost of trial ripens and prepares food for the soul. In the tight grip of the frost the hard shells of walnut and chestnut and hickory open. and the luxuries of the woods come into our laps or upon our tables: so the frost of trial takes many a hard and prickly shell and crushes it until that which stung the soul now feeds it. There are passages of Scripture that once were enigmas, puzzles, riddles, and impossible for you to understand, but the frosts of trouble after a while exposed the full meaning to your soul. You said, "I do not see why David keeps rolling over in his Psalms the story of how he was pursued and persecuted." He describes himself as surrounded by bees. He says: "They compassed me about like bees; yea, they compassed me about like bees." You think what an exaggerating thing for him to exclaim, "Out of the depths of hell have I cried unto thee, O Lord." And there is so much of that style of lamentation in his writings you think he overdoes it, but after a while the frost comes upon you in the shape of persecution, and you are stuck with this censure and stuck with that defamation, and stuck with some falsehood, and lies in swarms are buzzing, buzzing about your ears, and at last you understand what David meant when he said: "They compassed me about like bees; yea, they compassed me about like bees," and you go down under nervous prostration, and feel that you are as far down as David when he cried, "Out of the depths of hell." What opened all those chapters that hitherto had no appropriateness? Frosts! For a long while the Bible seemed lop-sided and a disproportionate amount of it given up to the consolatory. Why, page after page and chapter after chapter and book after book in the Bible taken up with alleviations, with pacifications, with condolences. The Book seems like an apothecary store with one-half of the shelves occupied with balsams. Why such a superfluity of balsams? But after awhile the membraneous croup carries off your child, or your health gives way under the grippe, or your property is swept off by a bad investment, or perhaps all three troubles come at once—bankruptcy, sickness and bereavement. Now the consolatory parts of the Bible do not seem to be disproportionate. You want something off almost all the shelves of that sacred Dispensary. What has uncovered and exposed to you the usefulness of so much of the Bible that was before hidden? The frosts have been fulfilling their mission.

Put down all the promises of the Bible on a table for study, and put on one side the table a man who has never had any trouble, or very little of it, but pile upon the table beside him all encyclopaedias and all dictionaries and all archaeologies and all commentaries, and on the other side of the table put a man who has had trial upon trial, disaster upon disaster, and let him begin the study of the promises without lexicon, without commentary, without any book to explain or help, and this latter man will understand far more of the height and depth and length and breadth of those promises than the learned exegete opposite almost submerged in sacred literature. The one has the advantage over the other, because he has felt the Mission of the Frosts. O, take the consolation of this theme, ye, to whom life is a struggle and a disappointment and a gauntlet and a pang. That is a beautiful proverb among the Hebrews which says: "When the tale of bricks is doubled, then Moses comes."

Mild doses of medicine will do for mild sickness, but violent pains need strong doses, and so I stand over you and count out some drops that will alleviate your worst troubles if you will only take the medicine, and here it is: "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Thank God for frosts. What helped make Milton the greatest of poets? The frost of blindness. What helped make Washington the greatest of generals? The frosts of Valley Forge. What made it appropriate for one passing John Bunyan's grave to exclaim "Sleep on, thou prince of dreamers?" The frosts of imprisonment. The greatest college from which we can graduate is the College of Frosts. Especial trial fits for especial work. Just now watch, and you will see that trouble is preparative and educational. That is the grindstone on which battle-axes are sharpened. I have always noticed in my own case that when the Lord had some especial work for me to do, it was preceded by especial attack upon me. This is so proverbial in my own house that if for something I say or do I get poured upon me a volley of censure and anathema, my wife always asks, "I wonder what new opportunity of usefulness is about to open? Something good and grand is surely coming!"

What is true in my case, is true on a larger or smaller scale in the history of every man and woman who wants to serve the Lord. Without complaint take the hard knocks. You will see after awhile, though you may not appreciate it now, that by the breath of a good and loving God frost is given. Let the corners of your mouth so long drawn down in complaint be drawn up in smiles of content.

For many years, poets and essayists have celebrated the grace and swiftness of the Arabian horses. The most wonderful exhibition of horsemanship that I ever witnessed was just outside of the city of Jerusalem—an Arab steed mounted by an Arab. Do you know where these Arab horses got their fleetness and poetry of motion? Long centuries ago, Mohammed, with thirty thousand cavalry on the march, could find for them not a drop of water for three days. Coming to the top of a hill a river was in sight. With wild dash the thirty thousand horses started for the stream. A minute after an armed host was seen advancing, and at Mohammed's command one hundred bugles blew for the horses to fall in line, but all the thirty thousand continued the wild gallop to the river, except five, and they, almost dead with thirst, wheeled into line of battle. Nothing in human bravery and self-sacrifice excels that bravery and self-sacrifice of those five Arabian war horses. Those five splendid steeds Mohammed chose for his own use, and from those five came that race of Arabian horses for ages the glory of the equestrian world. And let me say that, in this great war of truth against error, of holiness against sin, and heaven against hell, the best war horses are descended from those who, under pang and self-denial and trouble, answered the Gospel trumpet and wheeled into line. Out of great tribulation, out of great fires, out of great frosts, they came. And let me say it will not take long for God to make up to you in the next world for all you have suffered in this. As you enter heaven he may say: "Give this man one of those towered and colonnaded palaces on that ridge of gold overlooking the Sea of Glass. Give this woman a home among those amaranthine blooms and between those fountains tossing in the everlasting sunlight. Give her a couch canopied with rainbows to pay her for all the fatigues of wifehood. and motherhood, and housekeeping, from which she had no rest for forty years. Cupbearers of heaven, give these newly-arrived souls from earth the costliest beverages and roll to their door the grandest chariots, and hang on their walls the sweetest harps that ever thrummed to fingers seraphic. Give to them rapture on rapture, celebration on celebration, jubilee on jubilee, heaven on heaven. They had a hard time on earth earning a livelihood, or nursing sick children, or waiting on querulous old age, or battling falsehoods, that were told about them, or were compelled to work after they got short-breathed and rheumatic and dim-sighted. Chamberlains of heaven! Keepers ot the King's robes! Banqueters of eternal royalty! Make up to them a hundred-fold, a thousand-fold, a million-fold for all they suffered from swaddling clothes to shroud, and let all those, who, whether on the hills, or in the temples, or on the thrones, or on jasper wall, were helped and sanctified and prepared for this heavenly realm by the Mission of the Frosts stand up and wave their sceptres!" And I looked, and, behold, nine-tenths of the ransomed rose to their feet, and nine-tenths of the sceptres swayed to and fro in the light of the sun that never sets, and then I understood, far better than I ever did before, that trouble comes for beneficent purpose, and that on the coldest nights the Aurora is brightest in the Northern heavens, and that "By the breath of God frost is given."

IDOLATRY OF THE HEART.

WHAT though thou hast not raised thine eye
The glorious sun to praise,
Nor marked the silver moon on high
With adorations gaze,
Though thou in superstitious rite
Hast never taken part;
Still may there be the gloom of night,
And idols in thy heart.

If thou in gold hast put thy trust,
And loved the shining pelf,
Then, a mean slave to sordid dust,
Thou hast betrayed thyself,
And made an idol doubtlessly
Enshrined within thy soul—
Mammon has been set up in thee
And holds thee in control.

Art thou a mother? E'en thy child
May be a curse to thee!
And all the mother's love beguiled
A stumbling block may be;
If but that gentle babe, thy bliss,
Take more than lawful part
Of what is due to Heaven: It is An idol in thy heart.

Or be it pleasure that prevails,
With all a syren's smiles,
To lead them on through flowery vales
With soft, seductive wiles,
That is thy idol, and thy bane;
Forsake the witching sin,
And turn to him whose love should reign
First and supreme within.

Talk not of pagan deities—
Of gods of wood and stone!
Full many a passion worse than these
Their willing votaries own.
Ambition, power, whatever tells,
Without all the Tempter's art
Dethrones the Infinite and dwells
An idol in your heart.

Marion Harland in Palestine.

Her Eastern Experiences Already Begun—Her Itinerary in the Holy Land—She will also Visit Egypt.

"MARION HARLAND" (Mrs. M. V. Terhune).
Now Traveling in Palestine for "The Christian Herald."

WHEN this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of its readers, Marion Harland, who lately sailed from these shores bound for the East, will be already in Palestine. The famous author, whose exclusive letters from the East to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will delight our readers in the coming months, made but a short stay in England. She proceeded to Paris in the first week of November, and left the French capital about the 13th inst., for Marseilles, at which port she took the P. & O. steamer for Port Said; the cholera quarantine at Naples preventing her from sailing at that port for Brindisi, as she had intended. Ample time has now elapsed to permit of her arrival in the Holy City, in the regular course of travel.

Assuming, therefore, that our traveler, after reaching the ancient port of Jaffa, has proceeded to Jerusalem, and there rested in the Grand Hotel in Jerusalem from the fatigues of the overland and Mediterranean journey, she will now enter on the real work of her Oriental tour. Her itinerary in Palestine will, to a considerable extent, be decided by circumstances as they arise.

She will visit among other notable places, Hebron, where the Tomb of Abraham is the object of central interest to the pilgrims of every nation under the sun; Cana of Galilee, the scene of the first of our Saviour's miracles; Bethany, the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus; Nain, the village in which dwelt the widow whose son was miraculously restored to life; Damascus, the oldest city in the world, which was a commercial metropolis even in patriarchal days, and which is even yet of surpassing interest, with its mosques, its harems, its rich bazars and rare manufactures; Tiberias, the most Jewish city in existence, with its peculiar people and unique customs and ceremonials; Carmel, with its Druse villages; Mar Saba, the oldest Christian convent on the globe; Nazareth, where Christ passed his youthful days while on earth, and worked at the carpenter's trade, besides many other places which need not be named in detail.

Marion Harland will spend Christmas week at Bethlehem, the scene of the Nativity. Her plans for the four months' stay in Palestine include such a variety of travel and experience as has never fallen to the lot of any American woman heretofore, and her letters, instinct with the modern life and color, as well as the sacred memories of the East, will possess an attractiveness which no book of travels heretofore published has even been able to give. Each letter will be published in the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD following its arrival, and as the series will begin almost immediately, we would urge our readers not to miss a single letter.

On concluding her wanderings in Palestine, it is Marion Harland's purpose to return to Alexandria and thence make a journey through Upper Egypt before returning home. The portrait on this page is reproduced from a photograph taken shortly before her departure for the East.

THE GLORIFIED SAVIOUR.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 17. Rev. 1: 9-20. Golden Text, Phil. 3: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

JUST as Daniel was specially prepared and educated by God to be the prophet of the last days of the Jews, so was the Apostle John prepared and educated to be the prophet of the last days to the Church of Christ. Daniel had all the advantages of education and of intercourse with cultured people that was possible in his day, while John was but a fisherman and a fisherman's son. But the vision of the Lord, in his glory reduced them to a level; its effect was the same in both. Daniel testifies: "I was left alone and saw this great vision, and there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was burned in me into corruption and I retained no strength" (Dan. 10: 8); the Apostle John says: "When I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead." (Rev. 1: 17).

John was, if we may venture to make comparisons, the most advanced of all the twelve apostles in

The Knowledge of God Himself.

He begins his Gospel, not with a genealogy like Matthew, or with a narration like Mark and Luke, but in the past eternity of God the Son. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." (John 1: 1). He begins his first Epistle, not with his own name, as Paul did, and Peter, James and Jude, but again with the eternal being of his Lord. "That which was from the beginning, which we have learned, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life." (1. John 1: 1). The divinity of Christ was ever his theme. He passed over and left to others the narration of the circumstances of his birth and childhood, he tells very little of his miracles and his healing power, but dwells with great circumstantiality on his two greatest miracles, the healing of the man born blind (John 9), and the raising of Lazarus (John 11), because these proclaimed unquestionably his divine power. As an evangelist we see little of John in the Acts of the Apostles, he appears rather as the companion of Peter, perhaps his praying helper. But once having taken up his position in the bosom of his Lord, he never really left it, and one cannot read his Gospel and Epistles with eyes anointed by the Holy Ghost, without seeing how the heart of his Lord throbs in all the writings of John, and that it was not his works, but himself that had conquered this Apostle, and made him meet to be the instrument which should convey his last revealed message to his Church before he comes again.

John's education in a divine school had taught him his nothingness. In his Gospel, in his Epistles, he never once mentions his own name, and when in this Book of Revelation he does speak of himself, it is as of one who is in no way remarkable. It is not "I, John, who have lain on the Master's bosom," or "I, John, who am privileged to see further into the future than any other man who has lived on earth." No it is "I, John, who also am in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." He claimed no prerogative which every true member of the Church of Christ might not also claim; he placed himself on a level with them all. But it was a level of self-emptiness which many of the churches of this day would hardly relish. John was a prisoner and an exile, unable to preach any longer, his movements restrained, his usefulness cut off, yet like Paul, he was "the prisoner of the Lord," and while he calls himself the companion of every tried Christian he adds "and in the kingdom." "He hath made us unto our God kings and priests," or (R.V.) "a kingdom, priests unto his God and Father" (R.V.) and, incarcerated as he was, John knew the power of his divine and eternal royalty "in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." Patience in suffering with him and for him and patience in waiting for his appearing.

He next speaks of his present circumstances, no word as to how or what he suffered, but only for what cause; "for the Word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." How little his persecutors knew that in exiling this faithful witness for the Lord and in hindering his testimony by word of mouth, they were working into the plans of God, to have John go alone with him that he might reveal to him "things which must shortly come to pass."

"I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard." It is easy to pray in the flesh, but we must be in the Spirit to hear God. "I heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet." To some the voice of God is so indistinct they can hardly distinguish it from other sounds. John had a practiced ear; no sound was so distinct to him as his Master's voice. "Saying: What thou seest write in a book, and send unto the seven churches which are in Asia." What! should he be the interpreter of the Lord to all the churches? What an honor! But John cannot be uplifted by it—he is in the presence of One who outshines all others. Instead of contemplating himself, and glorying in being the man favored, the instinct of John is to look upon his Lord.

"I Turned to See the Voice which spake with me," and being turned I saw seven golden candlesticks (the seven churches, verse 20); and in the midst of the candlesticks one like unto the Son of man. It was a Scriptural vision; the Lord had said: "Lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" [or age] and here is the Son of man in his glory, not occupied with the mighty universe which he created, but walking in the midst of his churches which he is preparing for himself!

He was clothed with a garment down to the foot and girded with a golden girdle. It was the same vision as that of Dan. 10; the same garment, the same girdle, the same eyes, the same feet, the same voice. Daniel was to seal his vision till the time of the end. (Dan. 12: 4, 9); John was not to seal his vision (Rev. 22: 10) "for the time is at hand." John had seen a glimpse of Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration when his face did shine as the sun and his garments became white as the light; but he did not see all which was given him to see now. Then it was only his face and his raiment which could be seen, now his eyes, his hands, his feet shone with glory. Dare we draw nigh and contemplate Jesus and his glorified members? For we are members of his body, of his flesh and his bones?" Dare we believe that just as really as our hands and feet are part of us, so we, as his members are part of him and are being prepared on earth to shine as members of his glorified body above.

God is Light.

All shone, feet, hands, girdle. His feet like brass, as if it had been refined in a furnace" (R. V.) just as Malachi, 3: 2, 3. And he had in his right hand seven stars (verse 20, seven messages or angels of the churches), and out of his mouth proceeded a sharp two-edged sword, the very two-edged sword which was at the gate of the Garden of Eden, and which "turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. 3: 24.), the very same which pierces even to the dividing of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and which is a discoverer of the thoughts and intents of the heart (Heb. 4: 12.), and his voice was as the sound of many waters, his word the sharpest, his voice the strongest, and his countenance as the sun shineth in his strength! Thus the glorified Saviour appeared to John. O how we understand his words; "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (1. John, 1: 5.). O how we understand that only "sons of light and of day" can await his coming without being taken by surprise (1. Thes. 5: 4, 5.)

But O how little this glory of Christ conveys to such as are not being purified by the discipline of the Holy Spirit! How strange and imaginative it may seem to those whose eyes are holden! But those to whom the Lord reveals himself in his word as the coming One, and who yield to him feel like falling at his feet as dead. In such blinding light, O how the defects and the shortcomings come out. O how everything which is not like Christ comes to light, and one is as slain before him!

THE ISLE OF PATMOS.

CHRISTIANity was in dire stress at the time John gave this Book of Revelation to the churches. It was about the year 68 or 69. Nero was just finishing his fiendish cruelties to the Christians and was slinking out of life by suicide. The horrors of the past few years were only the prelude to others that were to come, and this book was written with the object of strengthening the churches and individual Christians by the prospects of final triumph. For some time there were doubts whether the Apostle John was really its author. Its style is so radically different from the Gospel which bears his name that there was a general belief among scholars that the two books could not have been written by the same man. It is now, however, believed by the great majority of critics that the Revelation was certainly the work of John. It was the record of visions which he saw while in Patmos, a desolate island of the Ægean Sea. We are not told in the New Testament how John came to be there at that time. We infer from the ninth verse of this first chapter that his residence there was not voluntary, but whether he was driven there by the force of persecution, or was held there a prisoner by the Emperor, there is no evidence to show. He was, he says, the companion of the persecuted churches in tribulation, which seems to imply suffering of some kind, and there is a tradition that he was in banishment at Patmos, and was compelled to work in the mines. He appears to have been released and to have gone to Ephesus, where after Paul's departure and death he continued to labor until he had outlived all the apostles. There are various traditions about the time and manner of his death, but none of them can be relied upon as authentic.

Companion with you in tribulation and kingdom. The two go together. John was showing the persecuted Christians his sympathy with them by reminding them of the glory they would enjoy together. Swinnock tells the story of a man whose sympathy with a condemned Christian cost him his life. The sufferer was a physician named Ursinus who being led out to die for the Gospel began to waver. Vitalis, a godly man stepped to him and, though he knew it would cost him his life, encouraged him, saying, "What! have you been so industrious heretofore to preserve men's bodies, and will you now shrink at the saving of your own soul? Be courageous!" For which faithful counsel he was condemned, and suffered death on the same scaffold as the man he had encouraged.

I heard behind me a great voice. This book of the Revelation is called "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him." Thus, Christ was still in heaven, as he had been on earth, continuing to reveal God to the world. Bruce, in his work of travels in Abyssinia, relates that in a certain eastern court the king himself is never seen. When the decrees have been promulgated, he sits on a throne behind a lattice window, which is heavily curtained, and on the steps of the throne there stands one of high rank, who is called the "voice," or "the word," through which the king speaks and makes the proclamation More perfectly is Christ the word or voice of God.

One like the Son of Man. John knew Jesus well. It was not likely that the image of his Master would ever fade from his memory. Therefore, when he saw Jesus in glory, he would recognize him even there. There is an ancient legend, which tells how Satan tried to impose on a pious monk by appearing to him in a form much like that pictured of Christ. The wicked one was radiant with royal robes, and crowned with a jewelled diadem, and said, "I am Christ—I am descending on the earth—and I desire first to manifest myself to thee." The saint kept silence, and looked on the apparition; and then said, "I will not believe that Christ is come to me except I see him in that state and form in which he suffered; where are the marks of the nails? Show me the marks of the wounds and the cross." The false apparition vanished.

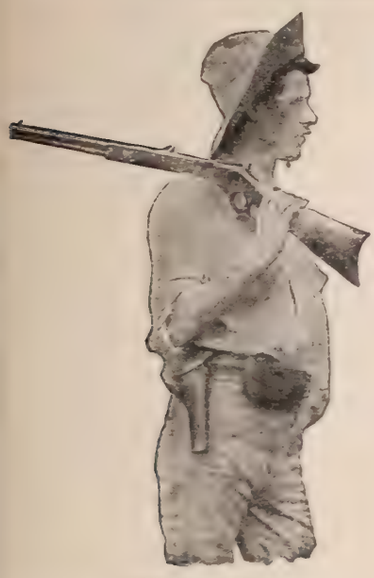
I fell at his feet as one dead. John was overcome by the majesty and glory of Jesus. Once before, John had similarly been overcome (Matt. 17: 6) by the glory of his Master. One evening, Charles Lamb, the brilliant essayist, was entertaining a party of literary friends. The conversation turned on the characteristics of great men and one of the party asked what would be their emotions if they could receive a visit from one of those great masters. "What," he asked, "would you do if Dante were to walk in?" Some made one suggestion, some another, but none of them could think of an appropriate way of receiving the man who had breathed the still pure air of the Mount of the Purgatorio, whose mind had tried to contemplate the mysteries of the unseen world, from that bewildering eminence. "Suppose," said another, "Shakespeare were to come?" "Ah," said Lamb, his face brightening, "how I should fling my arms up! How we should welcome that king of thoughtful men!" "And suppose said another, with reverent manner, Christ were to enter?" Lamb's whole face and manner changed in an instant. "Of course," he said in a tone of solemnity, "we should fall on our knees."

I am alive for evermore. In a time of deep depression, Luther retired to his study to gain strength. His enemies thought they had triumphed over him. Even Melancthon thought that the brave undaunted fighter was beaten. His own gentle spirit quailed under the repeated defeats. To him the cause of the Reformation seemed lost. He shut himself in his house and gave way to his grief in a torrent of tears. They somewhat relieved his depression, and at night he crept out in the darkness to find Luther, that they might lament in company. He made his way to his friend's study, and there sat Luther motionless at his writing-table in the dark. He had not risen or moved since he entered, and had not noticed that the sun had set. He stirred when Melancthon's voice aroused him and he called for lights. When lights were brought Melancthon saw, written on the table with a piece of white chalk "vivit," "vivit" [he lives, he lives]. In his abstraction Luther had written the word again and again when he entered his study, cheering himself with the one thought that had hope in it. The servants of Christ may die, but he lives on. Human lights may go out, but the divine light still shines. "I am alive forevermore."

The Living One. When the news of Lincoln's assassination came to New York, an excited crowd stood in front of the Federal building in Wall street. There were some desperate men there and some who were eager for revenge. Speaker after speaker tried to calm the passions of the mob, but to little purpose. The tide of anger and fierce indignation rose higher. None could tell when any moment it might burst all bounds and fire and bloodshed might ravage the city. In that crisis, the name of a newspaper of Southern sympathies was uttered by some mischievous person and the cry was raised "To the ———— office." A rush was made, but it was promptly halted by a loud, firm voice proceeding from a tall speaker at the front: "The Lord reigneth. Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Fellow citizens, God lives, and the government at Washington still survives." General Garfield was the speaker and as the crowd turned to look at him, he began pleading with them and urging them to faith and trust in God. His words soothed the passionate, frenzied multitude and his calm confidence in the future, based on the living God, was contagious. The crowd separated peaceably and the riot that seemed impending was averted.

ACROSS SOUTH CENTRAL AFRICA.

Dr. James Johnston's Missionary Journey from Benguella to the Mouth of the Zambesi—Experiences Among Strange Peoples.



DR. JAMES JOHNSTON.

AFRICAN exploration has charms for the scientist, the geographer, the trader and, last but not least, the missionary, such as no other part of the world can offer. The latest notable book on this subject is one entitled: "Reality vs. Romance in South Central Africa,"* which contains the record of a most remarkable journey across the Dark Continent from Benguella, on the west coast through Bihe, Barotse, the Kalihara Desert, Mashonaland, Garenganze, Nyasa, and the Shire Highlands to the mouth of the Zambesi on the East Coast. Dr. James Johnston, the writer of the book, is a medical missionary, whose effective Gospel work in the West Indies has already been fully described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. His object in undertaking a trans-continental journey, as he explains, was for the purpose of learning and disseminating the exact truth concerning the yet practically unknown parts of Africa about which earlier travelers had given conflicting accounts. He had also a second and more important object in view, viz: to survey the field with reference to its availability for missionary effort. His record presents the exact truth in detail, regarding that part of Africa which he traversed during a journey of 4,500 miles mostly on foot, occupying a period of twenty months. It is worthy of note that amid all his wanderings, Dr. Johnston never once found himself prompted to fire a shot in anger, or against a human enemy, although he went among the fiercest tribes. His only companions were a company of colored men from Jamaica, W. I., trained converts, who had been specially selected for the work, and whom he hoped to employ for the christianization and civilization of the interior tribes. This was an experiment that had engaged his attention for a long time, and one that could only be tested by actual experience.

Many of Dr. Johnston's observations on the peoples and customs of Africa have the charm of novelty. He says of the native in his unevangelized state: "if he calls for missionaries at all it is because he expects them to bring him cloth, beads, guns and gun-powder; but he is not particularly anxious for the Gospel for he is ignorant of its import and meaning and in his heathen condition wants nothing that does not add to his sensual gratification. Anything else he must be taught, and this means slow, uphill and often discouraging work." Family ties, he declares, are in most cases, less than nominal. "For that matter they think nothing of selling one another when it suits them . . . When the slave traffic on the East and West coasts is put down, by far the worst form of slavery will still remain untouched, as it exists today among the tribes of the distant interior."

Although Dr. Johnston and his caravan were well armed, his long journey was not without peril. Lions and other wild animals frequently crossed their path, and occasionally it was necessary to make something approaching a demonstration to impress hostile natives. The latter, however, were on the whole eminently peaceful in their attitude toward the traveler. Petty kings and headmen were encountered, and concerning some of these the traveler has interesting stories to tell. One, king Cipi, whom they met at Okambokokwengi, had his face and body streaked all over with white clay, as a protection against the evil spirits which the white man might bring around him. He would approach no nearer than twenty yards to the spot where Dr. Johnston was seated, and when the latter rose from his chair, the monarch jumped, dropped his blanket, and would have bolted, had not the dense crowd of subjects behind him prevented it.

At Cisamba, Dr. Johnston found the Rev. W. T. Currie, whose Gospel work among the Biheans has been described in previous issues of this journal. He spent a month there pleasantly and profitably, visiting the villages and surrounding districts and aiding in the medical work of the mission. While there he saw the natives harvesting their annual crop of caterpillars, which they dry in the sun, stew and eat as a relish with their cornmeal.

"I had intended going through the Katanga country and striking east to the lakes," Dr. Johnston writes: "purposing to visit, so far as my limited time would allow, those parts of South Central Africa of most interest to the friends of missions. But as there is only one sfation on this route, viz.: the Brethren Mission at Garenganze, and having met two of their party just returned from that country, who had been five months on the road, seeing but little worthy of note by the way, traversing for weeks together vast plains of burning white sand, I felt that to me it would mean five months wasted. So I decided to steer a course farther south, in the direction of the Barotse Valley, visit the French Evangelical Mission on the Zambesi, from thence pushing on to Nyasa as the way might open up. In the meantime, I set to work in earnest to acquire what I could of the Umbundu language, as an interpreter to accompany me was not to be had. Thus a further delay of several weeks was unavoidable. Within a few days, through the aid of Mr. Currie, a number of headmen from the surrounding villages were brought together and commissioned to collect carriers as speedily as possible."

KING LEWANIKA IN WAR DRESS

In the Marotsi country, Dr. Johnston, after undergoing the usual preliminaries, was presented to King Lewanika, who received him graciously. Of this visit he writes:

"I went to see Lewanika, whom I found sitting in his lekhothla or courtyard, in the center of the town, with a crowd of people kneeling in semicircles, near or far according to their rank. I was graciously received, and could not but feel that I was face to face with a real African king, compared with whom the many I had seen were but insignificant. Lewanika was plainly dressed in English clothes, and sat on an ordinary cane-bottom chair; his manner was affable and free. In front of him were his band of drummers and marimba players. Each company of men, as they assembled at the evening council, while still at some distance began clapping their hands in unison; and before taking their places raised their hands above their heads and shouted the royal salutation, 'Yo, sho, yo, sho; yo, sho?' After kneeling, they continue clapping, and bow their faces to the earth three times. To all this pomp and ceremony, with which the Marotsi have for ages surrounded the sovereign, Lewanika paid no attention (although I understand he is not indifferent to it,) but kept up a long conversation with me through an interpreter. He could not quite understand why I had come so far simply to see the country and the people, for he said, 'All the white men who come here either want ivory and skins, or liberty to hunt in my territory.'

"The mode of salutation among the Marotsi is peculiar. They approach a superior clapping the hands and repeating the word 'lumela;' but to equals they observe three different grades, according to the degree of friendship or relationship existing between them. Those having a slight acquaintance with each other will on meeting lay down their spears or whatever load they may be carrying, and, seizing each other by both hands, elevate them to about the level of their eyes, lowering and raising them three times, silently gazing into each other's face, and conclude the ceremony by squatting down and passing the snuff-box. The second mode of greeting applies to individuals between whom a close friendship exists; the same dumb show is performed, but in this case the parties kneel. The third form is observed only by near relations, and differs from the second in that each with his right hand seizes the left hand of the other, palm upward, on which he impresses a prolonged kiss, or kisses, according to the warmth of their attachment.

"In the evening, with much pomp and ceremony, preceded by his band of drums and marimbas, his majesty comes out to the lekhothla, where hundreds and sometimes thousands of his subjects are gathered, and kneeling in their usual semicircles round the spot where the royal mat is spread. A second chair is placed by that of the king and the white guest is invited to sit with him whim while court is being held. The business on hand is perhaps a case of witchcraft, poisoning, or cattle-stealing; or it may be to receive some of the many

"PASSING AWAY."

HOW could we keep our spirits up if this poor world we live now were all? The workmen have already begun to sweep up the Fall leaves, and in a few weeks all that now attracts the eye in the forest will have perished. And so it is with all earthly beauty and earthly association. Those with whom we mingle must be scattered into other circles or with ourselves must be gone. We have learned again and again that he who builds on earth his spiritual structure builds on a very poor foundation. "Passing away" is written on the forest. "Passing away" is written on all earthly emoluments and attainments. But not so with our future residence. Let the world perish, let its beauty be gone, holding Christ we hold an eternal possession. May God grant that the beauty of flower and fading leaf may be to our souls prophetic, inspiring and grandly elevating. And as out of the burning bush that Moses saw there came lessons for him, so may every bush now burning with Autumnal glory speak its emphatic lessons to our souls!

THE OLD RELIGION.

OUR modern religion has not enough backbone to stand alone. It must lean against the gate of the university or it flops right over. The old religion can stand alone and defiant of all assailment. It made no apologies and it offered no compromise to sin. We need, in order to get back to the old religion, which cannot be improved by human adulteration, to cultivate faith in the supernatural, not the supernaturalism which tries to look through the seance of the spiritualistic trickster into the next world, but the supernatural of Bible times, when iron swam and the foot walked water, and the dead wakened at the Christly call.

A man who does not believe in the supernatural is not a Christian and has not learned the first element of the Christian life. How well I remember the scene when in special services a gentleman of large culture, scholastic and critical to the last degree, came to the front seats, and when I asked if he was desirous of talking about his soul, he said: "By no means, I simply come up here as a matter of domestic courtesy; I wish you would talk with my wife, she is anxious to find the way of salvation." I talked with her on the subject of her soul's welfare, and after awhile the husband beckoned to me and said: "Why, there is something supernatural about this." I said: "Of course, it is all supernatural or it is nothing at all." "Why," he said, "my wife was not a Christian an hour ago, now she is a Christian." Sure enough she had, by the power of the Holy Ghost, been introduced into the light of the Gospel. I said to him: "Do you not feel some of this supernatural power in your own heart?" "No, sir," Some ten or fifteen minutes more of the religious service, some informal service passed by, and I saw his head bowed. I knew that the supernatural influence had seized upon his soul. After awhile I came to him. He looked up in my face and said: "I have found it too; I have given my heart to the Lord; I cannot tell you what a change there has been in my feelings in regard to Christ and the Christian religion. I am a Christian. I have but one great desire in this matter, and that is to profess faith before the world, if you will receive me." The one great distinctive quality of the Christian religion is that it is supernatural, and all this modern attempt to take the supernatural out of the miracles and the supernatural out of the life of Christ is a stab straight at the heart of God. Unadulterated Christianity is going to save this world and save it sooner than some of you have any idea.

UNHEALTHY DIET.

ADULTERATION of food is the subject ever and anon before the country. It seems that those of us who thought we had a respectable diet have been eating and drinking things that may not be mentioned. Honest, old-fashioned butter has melted and run out of the world, and instead thereof we have trichinosis in all styles served up morning, noon and night. All the ailments of the brute creation set before us in raw shape, or done up in puddings and pies and gravies. The wonders and mysteries and incomprehensibilities of hotel hash eclipsed by this blissful oleomargarine. Even the candies that we bring home to our children are under chemical analysis found to be crystallized disease. Lozenges of red lead and sweetened death. Coffees and teas, the innocuous beverages of millions, are so depraved that we feel like saying with Charles Lamb, when an unseemly mixture was placed before him, "If this be coffee, give me tea, and and if this be tea, give me coffee." Even the medicines, to which we appeal in dire distress, through apothecarial admixture, fail us and kill when they ought to cure. Alas! for the alum in the bread, and the chalk in the milk, and the glass in the sugar, and the Venetian red in the cocoa, and the heaven-knows-what in the syrup!

What we want is to organize a movement by which purchases shall be made at the suspected grocery stores and apothecary shops, some of each style of edibles and medicines, and that they be skilfully analyzed and the results published with the percentage of adulteration, the name of the store, and the number of the street. Let that be done in all our cities, and this iniquity will be stopped in a twelvemonth. In 1851, Mr. Wakely, in London, undertook the work, and though it threw the city into a fit of protest and indignation, the evil was for some time preceptibly abated. The ghastliness of American diet to which millions of people are subjected, may account for much of the sudden death and otherwise unaccountable insanity and the increasing suicide.

It is amazing that there is any good health left after the systemized and almost universal poisoning process. Let us agitate the subject in pulpit and printing-press and by legal vigilance, by so much as we care for our own health and the health of the people. But what is worse, adulteration has got into religion and the Bread of Life has been evilly tinctured, and the Milk of the Word watered. Free grace is the divine provision for the human family. In our time we mix it all up. A little grace will do with a decoction of humanitarianism and a few grains of spiritualism, and a liberal sprinkling of worldly philosophy, and a decided coloring of art, making it vermillion or ultra-marine, and then we take the tongs of the altar and stir it up and stir it down, and mix it in and mix it out, until much of the religion of this day is deception and death, instead of life.

Spiritual adulteration is the curse of the church of Jesus Christ in our day. There will never be any improvement on the old gospel. Everything added weakens its original power. What the world wants is Bible pathology and bible thereapeutics and Bible pharmacy in order to cure its disorders, and not the world's quackery. What it wants to feed its spiritual hunger is not the cake of human confection, which may please the taste, while it gives no brawn to spiritual character, but the strong meat of the Word and the bread of which, if a man eat, he shall never hunger. Away with the adulteration of food and medicine from your groceries and drug stores, and away with spiritual adulteration from the churches and theological seminaries. If we should all go back to primitive Christianity, the progress of the gospel, which is rapid now, would be a hundredfold accelerated. We want less of these modern admixtures, less of the gospel Darwinian, and more of the gospel Pauline.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Rev. C. E. Goodsmith, Lancaster, Ont. In answer to your correspondent, Mrs. M. L. Hudson, Silverwhite, Mo., about the origin of the lines, "The hut where a Gypsy boy lay," I may say that many years ago I personally heard from the lips of Rev. Samuel Chinn, then missionary to the hop pickers in England, that he was the individual in question. When in England, he was a personal friend of my own, but I presume that he has now gone to his reward in heaven.

Constant Reader, Richmond, Va. Where can I obtain information in regard to the workings of the American Protective Association, its literature, etc.?

G. E. Dunham, St. Joseph, Mo. What is the meaning of Matt. 24: 19?

That in the troubles that were impending as Christ had been predicting, when sudden flight and great hardship and danger must be borne, the lot of those women would be more grievous than that of others.

C. T. Ella, Newburgh, N. Y. What is the meaning of Jeremiah 48:10?

The revised version gives the word "negligently" instead of "deceitfully." Probably the prophet had the conduct of Saul (I. Samuel 15:9-19) in his mind when he wrote. He was predicting the utter extermination of Israel's ancient enemy.

J. J. Glen, Philadelphia; Mrs. Bearse, Worcester, Mass. and many others, have sent us the full text of Adelaide H. Procter's poem, "One by One," in response to the request of T. P. Clara, Fairmount, Ore. When does sanctification take place? I have always thought that it takes place at conversion, but a Methodist minister here urges converted people to seek it.

It begins at conversion and continues through life. A common illustration, which, however, is not altogether accurate, is that of a man in prison under sentence of death and also afflicted with disease. He needs both pardon and healing. Pardon corresponds to justification, which takes place at conversion, and is a completed act. Healing corresponds to sanctification, which may be a slow or rapid process, according to the subject. If he yields to the spirit's power, he makes rapid progress; if he resists it and clings to the world, the process is a slow and often a painful one.

H. S. Overmiller, Kinely, Pa. 1. Is there any explanation of the apparent contradiction in the two stories of Paul's conversion in Acts 9:7 and 22:9? 2. Did Jesus celebrate the Passover in the same way as the Jews? 3. What is meant by the Lord's Day in Rev. 1:10?

1. It is probable that the men with Paul heard a noise, but not an articulate voice, that is, could not distinguish the words. In John 12:29 there is another mention of a voice from heaven and in that case the people thought it was thunder. 2. As no mention is made of any difference, it is safe to conclude that Christ celebrated it as the Jews did. It was observed every year and he would not be likely to omit it. 3. It is supposed to have been the first day of the week which we call Sunday. Some have suggested that it may mean the day of Judgment with reference to the contents of the book, but the general opinion among Biblical scholars is that Sunday is to be understood.

William I. Nicholls, Hazleton, Pa. Is a minister of the Gospel justified in performing the marriage ceremony when one or both of the parties have been legally divorced?

If the cause of the divorce was that mentioned by our Lord (Matt. 5:32) he is justified in performing the ceremony. If the ground of the divorce was voluntary and protracted absence, especially if the absenting partner stayed away because the other was a Christian, it has been held by some divines that the validity of the divorce may be admitted and the minister may perform the ceremony, and they base their opinion on Paul's teaching (1. Cor. 7:15). This, however, is by no means an undisputed interpretation. If the divorce has been obtained on any other ground than these two, it is unscriptural and a conscientious minister will not regard the divorced persons as being free to marry again.

Mr. Walter E. Lee, writes from Honolulu, Hawaii, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"I have been assisting Brother Francis Penzotti in Peru, when he arrived in Callao, Peru. Dr. Talmage's sermons used to help us greatly. After our pastor, the Rev. Richard Barton, returned to the States in 1886, we were left alone, yet not alone. We still kept up the meetings in English, and when Brother Penzotti arrived we started a meeting in Spanish, which was prospering when I left for Hawaii in 1890. I have been doing what I could for the Master since I arrived here. I was in this island in 1882 when there were no free liquors here. The natives then were prosperous. Now they can't buy "poi" and some have to eat flour "poi." Please let me know the address of Rev. Francis Penzotti, also that of E. E. Olcott, who was in Peru in 1886. It was he pointed me to Jesus. I want to write to him.

M. C., Winchester, Md. Was Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea? I have heard that his mummy has been found.

The body of Menephtah has been found, and it has always been supposed by the majority of Egyptologists that he was the Pharaoh whose army was destroyed in the Red Sea. It is certain that he was the son and successor of Rameses II., whose reign and character correspond in many details to those of the Pharaoh of the oppression. Also it has been found out from the hieroglyphs that Menephtah had a son of great promise, who reigned with him and died mysteriously when a young man, as would have been the case at the slaying of the firstborn (Ex. 12:29) if Menephtah was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. There are also other points of identification. Menephtah was a coward. More than once in his history, on the eve of a battle, he professed to have had a vision commanding him not to go into the battle, and he stayed out of it to avoid personal danger. It is supposed that he avoided going into the sea after the Israelites on that or some similar pretext, and so saved his life.

Reader, Ontario. 1. Is it possible for any soul to be saved if God by his foreknowledge knows that it will be lost? 2. Will a man who has led a moral life, but has not accepted Christ, suffer the same doom as a murderer, thief, etc.? 3. Had the Lord any brothers or were those spoken of in the New Testament only his cousins?

1. It is not possible: but as no soul can tell what God foresees, it is its duty to accept the offers of the Gospel. Anyone complying with the conditions of those offers will be saved. No one need concern himself about God's foreknowledge when a plain duty is before him. 2. Very little is revealed to us in the Bible about the condition of the lost and there is no other source of information. Exclusion from heaven will be the great calamity in both cases. What the degrees of punishment may be is not revealed. 3. The question has long been in dispute. The natural inference from Matt. 13: 55, 56, is that the four men named were really the brothers of Christ. (They were not the Apostles of those names.) On the other hand, Jerome, Augustine and other early Fathers who lived near Christ's time, held that they were the sons of Mary's sister, mentioned in John 19: 25, and so, Christ's cousins. Their reasons for so believing do not appear strong ones. The New Testament writers distinguished the two degrees of relationship, as you may see in Acts 23: 16.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE BRAZILIAN REVOLUTION.

THE prediction that the Peixoto government in Brazil would be overthrown before the end of November has been falsified by events. Fighting has been going on in a desultory way through the month and Rio Janeiro has never known from day to day when the bombardment might be renewed with redoubled energy. Admiral Mello has, however, concentrated his efforts on the forts, but without silencing them. On the contrary a shot from the Fort of St. John has sent the Javary, his most powerful vessel to the bottom, with all on board. Details of this catastrophe have not arrived at the time of writing and there is considerable curiosity as to the way in which it occurred, as the forts had no guns capable of penetrating the Javary's armor. Her machinery was disabled and she had to be towed about the harbor, but her fire was most destructive, as she was armed with heavy guns and could vary her points of attack. It is conjectured that she must have met with some accident that changed the centre of gravity and the vessel turned over, as the Victoria did. Mello's situation is further complicated by the sailing of the Government's new vessel El Cid from New York under its new name of Nictheroy. She has a dynamite gun on board and will prove a formidable accession to the Government's forces. Mello has proclaimed a provisional Government, with Captain Frederico Lorenzo as President. The headquarters of this Government are at Desterro. A picture of the modest building in which the executive is lodged, appears on this page. It was reported recently that Mello had proclaimed the Empire, with Prince Pierre, a grandson of Dom Pedro, at its head. That rumor has how been denied, but for a time it caused considerable excitement among the adherents of the old empire, who are weary of this fratricidal conflict, dislike both parties and would be glad to see a stable government re-established. War vessels representing Germany, France, England, the United States and other nations are at the scene of conflict, but are powerless to stop the fearful waste of life and disturbance of peaceful pursuits. International precedent and mutual jealousies restrain them from interfering. It is a pity that it is so, for in a case like this, in which the combatants on each side are fellow-countrymen, the power which brought them from hatred to amity would surely be worthy of the Saviour's benediction, "Blessed are the peacemakers." (Matt. 5: 9.)

Preferred Criminal Friends.

An effort to secure a pardon for a criminal who is serving out a sentence in one of the jails of Pennsylvania has been thwarted by the man himself. He comes of an eminently respectable family and his father was a useful clergyman. In the war he served with credit and attained the rank of lieutenant. After his discharge, at the end of the conflict, he fell into idle, dissolute ways and committed a crime to obtain funds for dissipation. He was detected and served a term in prison. Since that time he has consorted with criminals and has often been in prison. Some time ago, an old friend of the family determined to make an effort to reclaim him. He induced a business acquaintance to promise the man employment in his office, and arranged in other ways for the criminal to have opportunities of redeeming his past. Influential persons were interested in his case and made an appeal to the Governor. Finally, a pardon was assured if the man would express contrition and promise amendment. The gentleman who had achieved this result went to the prison to get the convict's signature to the petition. To his amazement the man declined to sign. He said he had no desire to return to respectable society. He had become used to criminals and their ways and preferred to end his days among them. The man was evidently sincere, so all the time and trouble that had been spent on his case was wasted. His frank confession teaches a lesson to young people who think that after they have seen the world, and sowed their wild oats, they will repent and be reconciled to God. It is a perilous experiment. The more probable result is that they will be enmeshed in their sinful associations, and not only, like this man decide to end their days in sin, but will begin eternity in the same way, under the awful sentence. "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." (Rev. 22:10-11.)

A Knotty Question.

A dispute involving the possession of a large fortune is shortly to come before the courts. It arises out of the loss of two lives in the recent appalling disaster at Battle Creek, Mich. Two of the victims were husband and wife, both of whom had considerable independent estates. They had no children, and the claimants for their property are distant relatives. According to the terms of the husband's will his property would, at his death, pass absolutely to his wife if she survived him, and the wife had also made a will making her husband her heir. If there had been any considerable interval between the deaths of the two, the personal relatives of the survivor, in the event of no later will being made, would inherit the combined estate, to the exclusion of the relatives of the one who died first. The question to be decided is whether it is probable that one died before the other, and, if so, which of the two. Or if they died simultaneously, which set of relatives is entitled to inherit. Apparently the decision of the court will be based on probabilities. If, before it is pronounced, some survivor of the accident were suddenly to appear in court and say that he could declare positively which died first, how eagerly the litigants would listen to his evidence, for it would make one side or the other rich. They would not display the languid interest that is seen in many hearers of the Gospel who, when they are told of the death of Christ and of the eternal riches which it insured to all believers, listen as if it did not concern them. (Rom. 2:4.)

An Automatic Detector.

Successful use appears to be made of a novel automatic device lately introduced on some of the German railways for ascertaining and definitely indicating defects existing in the track. The principle of the apparatus, as explained, is based on the fact that every low point, or other similar defect, on the line of the track causes a shock of greater or less intensity in a car passing over it. The arrangement of the apparatus in the inspection car is such that, if the shock exceeds a certain degree of intensity, a squirting device is brought into operation, and from which either a red or a blue liquid is sprayed over the roadbed, making stripes from one foot to seven feet long and about two inches wide—the track sections requiring any attention being thus very plainly marked. Such an apparatus, it is said, locates defects not ordinarily detected by a track walker, and affords timely evidence of imperfections in the roadbed. It is, of course, assumed that when the defect is thus marked it will be promptly remedied, and not be allowed to get worse and worse until some train is thrown off the track. Unhappily we are not so careful to prevent moral and spiritual catastrophes, or saloons, gambling dens and other vicious resorts would have been removed long ago. (Romans 14: 13.)

Cats in a Church Spire.

A Boston journal says that a singular discovery was made at Brighton a few days ago by some workmen who were employed in tearing down the spire of the old church of that town. They began by removing the heavy wire screen that has enclosed the belfry since the far-away time when the church was built. When the screen fell, the workmen were astonished to see three cats in the place which was supposed to be empty, save for the bells. The cats were evidently terrified by the sight of human beings. They sprang with extraordinary agility from rafter to rafter, up into the peak of the spire. How they came there no one knows, but they must have been in the strange refuge for many years. It is now recalled that at intervals strange noises have been heard in the spire, which by the superstitious were attributed to a supernatural cause, and by others to the creaking of the vane. The most mysterious part of the discovery is how the animals could have lived. It is supposed that they must have preyed on the sparrows and swallows that settled on the spire, but they could not get access to water. The people who thought that the noises in the spire had a supernatural origin will probably be less disposed in future to entertain superstitious ideas. It may be hoped, however, that they will not go to the other extreme, which just now is too common in our churches, of attributing to natural causes, the origin of all things which is really supernatural. (Heb. 1: 10, 11.)

THE HEADQUARTERS OF THE BRAZILIAN REVOLUTIONISTS AT DESTERRO.

A Human Ladder.

At a tenement house fire in New York on November 24 a number of persons escaped a horrible death by the presence of mind and physical strength of two sympathetic rescuers. The building was six stories high with fire-escapes in the rear. A neighbor saw smoke issuing from it and notified the policeman on the beat. He turned in an alarm and then ran to arouse the tenants. The front door was locked, but the policeman clambered over a rear wall and there saw a sad sight. The fire-escapes were crowded with excited people, and behind them, the windows illuminated by the blaze within, showed how near they were to death. Ladders led down from one fire-escape to another, but it was useless for the inmates of the higher floors to descend, as the lowest fire-escape was crowded and there was no ladder from it to the ground. The policeman searched for a ladder, and at last found one, but it was too short to reach the lowest fire-escape by four or five feet. The flames were bursting out from the upper windows and no time could be lost. Singling out a strong man from among the spectators, the policeman spoke to him and the man nodded assent. In a moment the upper end of the ladder rested against the fire-escape and the foot was planted on the man's shoulders. He braced himself firmly and the policeman held the ladder in place while the menaced people poured down it, until the last one reached the ground in safety. The same kind of effort is needed for the salvation of souls. Our fine church buildings, our organs and systems of mission work will all fail to reach the people if there is no human element in the ladder. There must be humanity full of love and self-sacrifice engaged in the work if souls are to be won. (I.Cor. 13:1-3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Scriptures in whole or in part have been printed in 354 languages or dialects. The American Bible Society has aided in translating, printing or distributing in ninety-five of them.

A man who declared in New York last week that he did not believe in God, heaven or hell, was excused from jury duty. Judge Truax endorsed the man's summons with the words: "Excused on the ground that he is not mentally qualified to act as a juror."

The Children's Aid Society has recently established one of its schools in Rivington street, New York, in the very centre of the Hebrew population. Nearly all of the four hundred children in attendance are from families of Russian refugees. Many of them speak no English, but learn with amazing facility.

The annual report of the Convention of Christian Workers at Boston in 1892, has been adopted as a text-book of Applied Christianity in Chicago Theological Seminary. Prof. Graham Taylor says that his students can have no better means of learning the application of Christianity to the needs of the world in the present day, than these reports of evangelistic efforts.

The Asia Minor Exploration Fund of England, calls for a fund for the purpose of exploring the site of Lystra and discovering the Temple of Jupiter, where worship was offered to Paul and Barnabas. Professor J. B. S. Sterrett discovered the site of Lystra recently.

The report of the Governor of Oklahoma shows a population of 151,304. The number of churches in the territory are: six Episcopal, 165 Methodist, 25 Baptist, 24 Congregational, 25 Catholic and 24 Presbyterian. There are also three Epworth Leagues and fifty Christian Endeavor Societies.

At the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, a missionary service was held on Nov. 19. Two members of the Volunteer Missionary band of Union Theological Seminary spoke on the needs of the foreign field and aroused the sympathies of the church so thoroughly that it was proposed to take up a collection there and then although it had not been intended to have a collection. The sum of $905. was put in the boxes.

The Christian aid to Employment Society in New York is in pressing need of help. The number of unemployed persons who are trying to get work and apply to the Society is far greater than the number of positions on its books. Some of these are gentlewomen who are facing the cold world for the first time and are in bitter need. The Society would be glad to give them temporary relief in food and clothing until it can find work for them, but its funds are exhausted. Any gifts sent for this purpose to the Treasurer of the Society, 50 Bible House, New York, will be very gratefully received and distributed.

A meeting of Brooklyn ministers of various denominations was held a few days ago in the hall of the Y. M. C. A., to organize plans for conducting and extending the revival work commenced by Dr. A. C. Dixon and Evangelist Pearson. A committee was appointed to take charge of the work. The following ministers have consented to serve: Revs. A. C. Dixon, J. O. Wilson, J. M. Farrar, R. E. McClelland, G.W.Hutington and J. F. Carson. Services will be commenced in a large number of churches on Jan. 1. An effort will be made to secure the assistance of Mr. D. L. Moody. Mr. Henry Varley is now in the city taking an active part in the movement.

THE PILGRIM'S PLACE AND PROMISE.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Dr. A. J. Gordon. "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it unto you: come thou with us and we will do thee good; for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." Num. 10: 29.

HAT a gracious invitation and promise of Moses to his kinsman! A genuine Gospel call, though made long before the time of Christ! It was met with the same refusal which the message often receives to-day, and then it was reiterated with fresh and strong inducement. "If thou wilt go with us yea it shall be that what goodness the Lord shall do to us, the same will he do to thee." Let us make this message our message and consider:

1. Our destination. "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, 'I will give it you." Not a word is said about the locality, the scenery or the occupation of this place. It is a most singular style of description to put upon the Gospel guideboards—"a place of which the Lord said, I will give it you." But in the New Testament, I find it characterized in precisely the same language. For Jesus says: "I go to prepare a place for you." That is all.

And yet how much is involved in these descriptions: "I will give it you." "I go to prepare a place for you." A gift is supposed to benefit the giver. When Cæsar bestowed a very sumptuous present upon one of his subordinates, the recipient said, "Sire, I am unworthy of such a gift." And Cæsar replied: "It is not the question what you are worthy to receive, but what the Emperor is worthy to give." And be sure the Lord will give his people something a real, tangible, recognizable place; not some attenuated heaven where shadowy forms flit to and fro in a shadowy land, a dream-realm of ghosts, whose inhabitants know each other only by a kind of glorified mind-reading. "We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is," says the scripture. And he is what he was on earth, a man with a real face and hands and eyes and feet; only glorified with ineffable brightness; one who can still say: "Handle me and see that it is I; a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." This being so, our habitation must correspond. I believe that heaven is a real defined place, not an infinite everywhere, a real locality with material conditions and surroundings adapted to a material body only transformed and glorified.

Observe therefore some of the descriptions which are given of it. "There remaineth therefore a rest for the people of God." That is good news for you, if you are a hard-worked Christian who often get so tired that you ache in every bone and muscle in the Lord's service. But just put it down in your religious note-book that there remains no rest for those who never get tired; just as there is no "well-done" awaiting those who have never been employed in well-doing. "I go to prepare a place for you." But we must be prepared for that place which he has gone to prepare. And the best fitness you can acquire for that place is that you get so weary in patient life-long toil for your Master that when you get through it can truly be said of you, "He rests from his labors." And you cannot rest from your labors unless you have labored; "and his works do follow him," and your works cannot follow you unless you have worked. This is my first description of "that place of which the Lord hath said, 'I will give it you.'"

A Place of Deliverance.

But it is also a place of deliverance. "Let not your heart be troubled. I go to prepare a place for you." Mark the connection of thought. He did not say "This is the best world that was ever made: things are growing better and better; there is ten times more happiness than sorrow on the earth. Only live in the sunny side of the house; and keep your window curtains lifted, and you will be all right." No such optimistic vaporing as this. "In the world ye shall have tribulation." "Let not your heart be troubled, I go to prepare a place for you" in another world. The Scripture says that Christ came "to deliver us from the present evil world." Sin, sorrow, disappointment and death are real facts, so real that it took the tremendous anguish of the cross to overcome them. And our Lord came into this world and put himself beneath these things, in order that he might lead us out of them. Hence the significant words: "I go to prepare;" and from henceforth we are to look along the upward track of light which he left behind him, awaiting his summons to come after him saying triumphantly: "For our citizenship is in heaven from whence we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ." Our hope and succor are not in assimilating ourselves to present conditions or in transforming those conditions, but in following the Lord in the upward path of glory. St. Cuthbert was once driven upon the coast of Fife by a terrific snow-storm, and to his disheartened comrades he said: "The storm bars our way over the sea; the snow has closed our path upon the land but the lies open." Heroic and most scriptural utterance! Since our Lord ascended into Paradise, he has "opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers." And he has never allowed the way thither to become blocked and never will. Therefore note the concluding words of the promise: "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself." No soul is left alone to climb the "scala sancta" of heaven, the holy ladder on which the angels ascend and descend. Our forerunner Jesus has passed within the veil and he will come forth again and fetch us thither with him, that where he is we may be also.

And the chief glory of Paradise is that we shall see him, and all blessing and glory in their relation to him. "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off," or as the words stand correctly translated in the margin of my Bible, "the land of far distances." I do not know that heaven is far off; but I do know that from it I can see afar off. And this to me is a most significant thought concerning it. The happiest and most exalted moments I ever know in this life are those when I stand on some high out-look of my New Hampshire home, and gaze off upon the blue hills in the distance, and see those hills rising, range upon range, as though they were the very portals of Beulah-land. There is something indescribable in these mountain-top experiences, and they never fail to lift me out of myself and bring me nearer to God.

Life's Panorama.

"I shall see the King in his beauty and the land of far distances." Yes, all the pathway of my life, now stretching away behind me! each dangerous turn in the road,—and how I was mercifully protected in passing it; each fortunate juncture and how I was brought to it, the whole landscape of my history from the cradle to the crown, now lying like a panorama at my feet. My earthly life is now like a dissected map. I can see the parts lying disconnected here and there; but in glory I shall see it put together, part fitting into part, and all making up one wondrous whole. I shall now see how it all stands related to my glorified Lord, into whose face I am gazing. I shall see the King in his beauty, and all standing in blessed relationship to him, he, the author and finisher of my faith; he the architect and builder of my life; he, the origin and end of all my ways, though I knew it not. What reason will there be for praise when I stand with the Lamb upon Mount Zion, in company with those who have been redeemed from among men. For, in the glorified Christ, all contradictions shall vanish; all mysteries be explained; all things be seen to have worked together for good to them that loved God, and were the "called, according to his purpose." Therefore, I consider it to be the greatest promise of the future: "they shall see his face." For when we see him we shall see all in him and him in all.

Companionship.

2. Our traveling companions. "Come thou with us and we will do thee good." It is the instinct of true piety to seek companionship in the heavenly journey. If one is perfectly contented to go to heaven alone, it is the best evidence that he is not going there at all. "See that man," said Dr. Guthrie, alluding sarcastically to a selfish Christian, "his religion is just the size of his coffin, exactly large enough for himself, and no larger." If there is one thing which you ought to be zealously emulous for, it is that your Christianity should be like a carriage, in which there is always room for more, and from which you should always be reaching out to urge others to come in with you. It is the peculiarity of the church to be ever inviting. "The Spirit and the Bride say come" is the description which our Lord gives of the church. And I would that we might all so imbibe and master this characteristic that, whether at home or abroad, this word "come" should be always on our lips. The love of Christ and the love of man, conspire at this point. If you love Christ, how can you but long to give him those whom he has purchased at the price of his bleeding

Toil on Calvary.

If you love your fellow-men, how can you but long to bring them to Christ? Let me press the question upon you. Do you feel this longing? Do you have it concerning the heathen? Do you have it concerning your neighbors? Do you have it concerning your own family? How unnatural it is if you do not? Do you remember that touching conversation between Judah and his brother Joseph in Egypt? When it was proposed to leave Benjamin behind as a hostage, Judah broke out, pathetically, "How shall I go up to my father and the lad be not with me?" Have you set your face heavenward, and have you a confident title to a mansion in glory? But, my brother, the only valid assurance that you shall have a home with Christ hereafter is that you have the heart of Christ now. He, our Divine Lord, knew that in a little while he should return to his Father, whence he came; but little place did this anticipation have in his thoughts, compared with his solicitude to bring others there with him! His heart was occupied in seeking and saving that which was lost; he yearned for the cross, because by that cross he could bring many souls into glory, His question was not how can I get back to the glories of heaven, but "How can I bring the lost, ruined and suffering children of men into that glory?" All the sorrow of Gethsemane; and all the agony of Calvary were an answer to this question. This, my brother, is the plainest token of Christ-likeness; not merely that you are ready to lose all to win heaven for yourself, but to lose all to Bring others to Heaven.

But now observe: If you are to succeed in bringing souls to heaven with you, it must be distinctly seen that you are journeying that way yourself. A Christian cannot look in one direction, and live in another, without utterly neutralizing his influence. Your profession and your conduct must both point the same way if you expect men to go that way. For the invitation is not only "come," but "come with us." Suppose you were to go to the Eastern depot to-morrow morning and buy a ticket for Portland, and go to a train headed for Portland, and get into a car marked for Portland and take your seat. I come along and you see me and raise the car-window and call out to me saying, "Come, go with me to New York." I should be likely to say in reply, "Why, my friend, don't you see that you are not going to New York yourself and how can you invite me with you?" You smile at the absurdity of the suggestion. But it is the literal translation of a constant fact. There are professed Christians all about us whom God has commissioned to cry "come." But they are not going themselves and therefore they get no one to follow them. They have become earthly-minded and hence they can do nothing to make their hearers heavenly-minded. O God save me from this paradox of apostacy, trying to heaven while I am beckoning them towards earth by my love of self, or love of evil, or love of money. And there are Christians all about us who are exhorting men to repentance, who have practically repented of their own repentance and gone back upon it. They have their baggage all marked and checked for a worldly station, which station is named "wealth," or "ease," or "good society," or "high position," and then they say to the unconverted: "Come with us and we will do you good." And men won't come with you because they are just discerning enough to see that you are on the same line as themselves. You remember that it is told in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress that when Christian and Hopeful told Atheist that they were "going to Mount Zion", Atheist" fell into very great laughter." Nor are we told why. Perhaps because he saw that they had bought their ticket for the Slough of Despond instead of Mount Zion and was chuckling to think of their discomfiture when they should reach their destination and find what a mistake they had made. Ah! my hearers, whither are you going? This is the question, and not what are you saying and professing. Are you sure that your destination is heavenward? Like pilgrims of old going up to Jerusalem, are you singing your song of degrees saying, "We go from strength to strength till every one of us appeareth in Zion before God." Is your path" the path of the just that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." If so, you may invite others to enter that path.

3. Our inducements. "And we will do you good."

This is the Christian's business. And if he is to succeed he must be always at it. The world's maxim is "get all you can"; Christ's rule is "give all you can." The world says, "Gain all the good in your power"; Christ says: "Do all the good in your power." And so in that grand summing up of the epistle to the Hebrews it is written, "But to do good and communicate, forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." "Sacrifices!" "I thought sacrifices had been abolished," you say. Not abolished, but transformed; made memorial instead of expiatory. We say Christ died that we might not die. More truly should we state the case were we to declare that he died that we might die, He died for sin that we might die to sin; he bore the cross for us that we might with him, and for our fellow-men. His crucifixion has ceased indeed, since "by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified"; but only that we might prolong it among lost and sinning men forever." You will tell me that I make the Christian life sombre and serious by dwelling so much on the duty of self sacrifice. I tell you, on the contrary, that if there is any life on earth that is supremely happy and filled with divine radiance, it is the life in which doing good to others is the supreme business. Oh, men and women who hear my voice, do not misunderstand us. We do invite you to go with us, not because we expect to profit by you; to get you into our church to count you up as our converts, or to get you to pay money into our treasury. We sound out the word, once more: "Whosoever will, let him come and take the water of life freely." But we want you to come, that we may do you good; that we may give you joy for your sorrow; healing for your hurts; riches for your poverty; peace for your conflict, and at last glory for the misery and condemnation of your sins. Come then with us! Exchange your "pleasures of sin for a season" for the pleasures at God's right hand, which are "forevermore." Come, then, with us!

A HEATHEN'S TRANSFORMATION.

From Banza Manteke, on the Congo where the Baptist Missionary Society has a station, the Rev. H, Richards writes a remarkable narrative of the change of a heathen brawler into an earnest preacher. He says: "Just as I began this letter I was interrupted by two men, one an evangelist, and the other a strong, vigorous man of about thirty years, converted about four months ago. They were just going off two days' journey to preach the gospel to a people that have sent time after time for some one to come and tell them the good news. The name of the younger man is Choma Nloka, who was almost demon-like in his opposition to the gospel, and tried all he could to draw and entice the weak Christians away from the truth. He was a great malafu (palm-wine man), a leader at the makinu (heathen dances), etc. One of our evangelists got hold of him, and his whole life was changed. It is a wonderful story, but time fails to tell it. I do not remember any one who developed so rapidly. He began preaching at once, and has been the means of bringing many hard sinners to Christ. Naturally influential and intelligent, he has learned to read, and is a power for good. One day he brought a gang of heathen men into the meeting. After I had done preaching, he stood up and addressed the gang he had brought in, and exhorted them to believe in Jesus. "You see all these people," said he; "we were all like you, but now we are saved and happy, and know that the word of God is true, and that heathenism is a lie" He is now on his way to preach two days off. He has never received a cent for his work and has relinquished a great many sources of income.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Dr. Talmage Tells How and Where He Wrote

"From Manger to Throne."

"IN my American home, on the Atlantic, on the Mediterranean, on camel's back, on mule's back, on horseback, under chandelier, by dim candle in tent, on Lake Galilee, in convent, at Bethel where Jacob's pillow was stuffed with dreams and the angels of the ladder landed, at the brook Elah, from which little David picked up the ammunition of five smooth stones, four more than were needed for crushing like an egg-shell the skull of Goliath, in the valley of Ajalon, over which, at Joshua's command, Astronomy halted, on the plain of Esdraelon, the battle-field of ages, its long red flowers suggestive of the blood dashed to the bits of the horses' bridles, amid the shattered masonry of Jericho, in Jerusalem that overshadows all other cities in reminiscence, at Cana where plain water became festal beverage, on Calvary whose aslant and ruptured rocks still show the effects of the earthquake at the awful hemorrhage of the five wounds that purchased the world's rescue, and with my hand mittened from the storm, or wet from the Jordan, or bared to the sun, or gliding over smooth table, this book has been written.

* * * Not a word of Latin or Greek in all the book, unless it be translated. We tell the story in Anglo-Saxon, the language in which John Bunyan dreamed and William Shakespeare dramatized, and Longfellow romanced, and John Milton sang, and George Whitefield thundered. * *

* * * Blessed to me was the hour when my mother taught me how to frame the first sentence out of it, and my last word on earth shall be a draught upon its inexhaustible treasury." T. De Witt Talmage

PSALM 1.

Happiness of the godly, misery of the wicked.

BLESSED [a]is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the [1]ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful:
2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.
5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.
6 For [c]the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

Prayer for God's guidance. PSALMS 5, 6, 7. Prayer for safety.

[2]hare mercy upon me, and hear my prayer.
2 O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into shame? how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? Selah.
3 But know that [a]the LORD hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the LORD will hear when I call unto him.
4 Stand [b]in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. Selah.
5 Offer [c]the sacrifices of righteousness, and [d]put your trust in the LORD.
6 There be many that say, Who will show us any good? [e]LORD, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.
7 Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased.

PSALM 5.

4 God favours not the wicked. 7 David prays unto God to guide him.

To the chief Musician upon Nehiloth. A Psalm of David.

GIVE ear to my words, O LORD; consider my meditation.
2 Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God: for unto thee will I pray.
3 My [a]voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.
4 For thou art not a God that hath [b]pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee.
5 The [c]foolish shall not stand [1]in thy sight: thou hatest all workers of iniquity.
6 Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing: the LORD will abhor [2]the bloody and deceitful man.
7 But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship [d]toward [3]thy holy temple.
8 Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness because of [4]mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face.
9 For there is no [5]faithfulness [6]in their mouth; their inward part is [7]very wickedness; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue.
10 [8]Destroy thou them, O God; let them fall [9]by their own counsels; cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee.
11 But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because [10]thou defendest them: let them also [e]that love thy name be joyful in thee.
12 For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou [11]compass him as with a shield.

PSALM 6.

David's complaint in his sickness.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith, A Psalm of David.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
2 Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak: O LORD, [a]heal me; for my bones are vexed.
3 My soul is also sore vexed: but thou, O LORD, [b]how long?
4 Return, O LORD, deliver my soul: oh save me for thy mercies' sake:
5 For [c]in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?
6 I am weary with my groaning; [2]all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.
7 Mine eye is consumed because of grief; it waxeth old because of all mine enemies.
8 Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity; for the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping.
9 The LORD [d]hath heard my supplication; the LORD will receive my prayer.
10 Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed: let them return and be ashamed suddenly.

PSALM 7.

1 David prays against the malice of his enemies, professing his innocence. 10 By faith he sees his defence, and derides their rash enterprises.

[a]Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the LORD, concerning the [1]words of Cush the Benjamite.

O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me:
2 Lest he tear my soul like [b]a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is [2]none to deliver.
3 O LORD my God, [c]if I have done this; if there be iniquity in my hands;
4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me; (yea, [d]I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy:)
5 Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah.
6 Arise, O LORD, in thine anger, lift [e]up thyself, because of the rage of mine enemies; and awake for

7 But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy: and in thy fear will I worship [d]toward [3]thy holy temple.

8 Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness because of [4]mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face.

9 For there is no [5]faithfulness [6]in their mouth; their inward part is [7]very wickedness; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue.

10 [8]Destroy thou them, O God; let them fall [9]by their own counsels; cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee.

11 But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because [10]thou defendest them: let them also [e]that love thy name be joyful in thee.

12 For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou [11]compass him as with a shield.

PSALM 6.

David's complaint in his sickness.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith, A Psalm of David.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

2 Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak: O LORD, [a]heal me, for my bones are vexed.

3 My soul is also sore vexed: but thou, O LORD, [b]how long?

4 Return, O LORD, deliver my soul: oh save me for thy mercies' sake!

5 For [c]in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?

6 I am weary with my groaning; [2]all the night make I my bed to swim, I water my couch with my tears.

7 Mine eye is consumed because of grief; it waxeth old because of all mine enemies.

8 Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity; for the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping.

9 The LORD [d]hath heard my supplication, the LORD will receive my prayer.

10 Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed: let them return and be ashamed suddenly.

PSALM 7.

1 David prays against the malice of his enemies, professing his innocence. 10 by faith he sees his defence, and derides their vain enterprises.

[a]Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the LORD, concerning the [1]words of Cush the Benjamite.

O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me;

2 Lest he tear my soul like [b]a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is [2]none to deliver.

3 O LORD my God, [c]if I have done this; if there be iniquity in my hands;

4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me; (yea, [d]I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy:)

5 Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah.

6 Arise, O LORD, in thine anger, lift [e]up thyself, because of the rage of mine enemies: and awake for Delighted with the Premiums.

What Some of Our Subscribers Say of "From Manger to Throne," and the Teachers' Bible.

EVERY mail brings to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD scores of letters from both new and old subscribers, expressing their delight with the premiums they have received. Extracts from a few of these appreciative communications received this week, are given below:

STERLING, ILLS.—"Manger to Throne" just received. It is a gem of beauty, a treasury of instruction, and the most elegant premium I ever saw. WM. W. DAVIS, Supt. Luth. S.-School.

MOULTON, IA.—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and book ("From Manger to Throne") received. Many, many thanks! Hardly feel right in taking so much for so little. I will try and give others a chance to secure such a prize also. M. C. ALEXANDER.

RIDGEFIELD, N. J.—Your magnificent premium is received. I could say no more in a volume than I can say in one sentence. I know of nothing that can be compared with "From Manger to Throne;" either for the general get-up, or type, or printing, or matter, or, above all, for authorship. REV. FERRER MARTYN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The premium, "From Manger to Throne," came promptly to hand. I have naught but the highest praise to offer you for this magnificent gift. It far exceeded my anticipations. I am more than delighted. I am satisfied that when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does anything of this kind it does it handsomely. G. CARLETON SMITH.

MALDEN, N. Y.—I am very much pleased with the paper and perfectly delighted with the book, so much so that if I could not get another I would not take five dollars for mine. MRS. S. E. SLATER.

BLOOMFIELD, N. J.—I am just in receipt of premium book "From Manger to Throne," and desire to express my thanks for same and also my admiration of it. It is a gem of a book and is certainly an unparalleled premium. FRED H. CARL.

MECHANICSBURG, PA.—I am astonished that you can give such a marvelous premium as this. I am reading it with the greatest delight. Many thanks to you and the good Doctor for making this excellent work so accessible to the public. W. K. FOSTER.

ASPEN, COL.—"From Manger to Throne" is a storehouse of interesting and suggestive information concerning Bible scenes and incidents, written in the peculiar style of the well-known and widely-read author. The wonder to us is how can you afford to give it. The book alone is worth more than the price for both. REV. A. W. GRAVES.

WASHINGTON, D.C.—To say that I am pleased with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the International Bible, and Dr. Talmage's "From Manger to Throne" but faintly expresses my feelings. I am delighted, and regard you as a benefactor of the human race. I have already procured two additional subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and hope to procure more. I hope there is no probability of your impoverishing yourself by your great liberality. Z. C. ROBBINS.

HARRISBURG, PA.—We are all highly pleased with the amount and variety of the Premium Bible, as well as with the durable and handsome style in which it is gotten up, and marvel at the cheapness of the same. EBEN ALLISON.

DEPOSIT, PA.— I have been a dependent invalid forty years. I have read much, and yet in all my reading, I have never met the like of Dr. Talmage. Such an imagination, such power of description! It is truly marvellous and ravishing. "From Manger to Throne" is a vivid, flashing, enthralling panorama of beauty. It is next to seeing the localities and objects with our own eyes. If I were a millionaire I would scatter a hundred thousand copies and more throughout the land. Both matter and manner are irresistibly fascinating. It is hard to lay the book aside when once we begin to read it, even when dim, weak eyes and aching head compel. Wonderful book, wonderful records, wonderful world, wonderful God. C. H. BALSBAUGH.

GRANVILLE, O.—My beautiful Bible came yesterday, and I am perfectly delighted with it. It is a perfect gem. I have already displayed it to many admiring friends. MRS. SILAS NOBLE.

SONS OF GOD.

"Beloved, now are we the sons of God etc."—I. John, 3:2.

"BELOVED!" Can it be
That we beloved are—
We, who once captive, led by sin,
Wandered from God, afar?

We, who, like others, once,
Children of wrath, were known,
Are now brought nigh, by precious blood—
The blood of Christ alone.

Now we're the sons of God.
Yet doth it not appear,
Nor can we tell, what we shall be
When Christ to earth draws near.

"As through a glass," while here
We darkly all things see;
But as he is, when he shall come,
We'll see and like him be.

We'll see him; oh, what joy!
There needs no added word:
From sin and doubt we shall be free.
We shall be like our Lord.

THE BIBLE.

HOLY Bible! Lamp Divine,
Gleam upon this path of mine;
Lest, while treading life's dark vale,
I should lose the guiding trail,
Made by weary, wounded feet
Going Calvary's Cross to meet.

Holy Bible! Precious Word,
Gird the Spirit's mighty Sword,
May I wield with fearless hand,
Passing through unfriendly land;
All my foes put thou to flight,
Crown me victor in the fight.

Holy Bible! Compass, Chart,
On life's trackless sea thou art;
Marking ev'ry reef and shoal,
That might wreck my storm-toss'd soul;
Then, when ends the voyage drear,
Safe to Port my vessel steer.

THE KINGDOM AND THE CHURCH.

The Difference Between Two Expressions a Clue to Prophetic Problems.

BY DR. MAC WILLIAM SAID.*

FROM the nature and character of the Church, and the nature of the dispensation throughout which the Church passes, and during which the Church is being gathered out to the name of the Lord Jesus Christ [illegible] we are justified in believing that the Church will be taken away before the great tribulation, described in Matt. 24 and other passages, begins. In the fourth Chapter of Luke we read that our Lord entered the synagogue of Nazareth and opened the book and read: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives and the recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord; and he closed the book." Now this is a quotation from the sixty-first chapter of Isaiah. I want you to notice when our Lord unrolled the book of the prophet Isaiah that he stopped in the middle of a sentence. Notice what immediately follows—"And the day of vengeance of our God."

Now, why did our Lord stop in the middle of this sentence? Because he was speaking to them of that that more immediately concerned his work during the first Advent; and, when he stops in the middle of a sentence, you have got that which in the order of prophecy refers to his First Advent.

When our Lord came the first time he came, in the first instance, to deal with the Jewish people, to give them the kingdom. Our Lord's first advent was as the "Anointed One" of God. According to all the prophets, Christ was to come and restore Jerusalem, and to reign; and by him should all the nations of the earth be blessed. And Christ came and declared himself the "One," the "Christ of God," whom it was the duty of the Jewish nation to receive.

The whole of that which he first declared was in connection with the things of the Kingdom; and John the Baptist, who was his forerunner, proclaimed the kingdom; you will also find that Israel was expecting to have its proper place among the nations of the earth, and that the Messiah would come, restore the kingdom, and reign over them; and, when the Lord Jesus Christ first came, his forerunner proclaimed this kingdom, and when our Saviour sent out the twelve, it was in order that they should proclaim the kingdom. And so you see there is a very great distinction between what is ordinarily called the Gospel of the Kingdom and the Gospel of the Grace of God. The Lord Jesus Christ proclaimed the Gospel of the kingdom, and you will find him throughout the whole of the Gospels declaring the things of the kingdom. But when it became manifest to himself and his disciples that he was to be rejected, he began to speak in dark hints of a new thing; and that new thing was the calling out and the building up of the church, which is to be "The Church of God" throughout all eternity. And so we have a distinct company being gathered out of all classes, Jew or Gentile, being gathered out of the heathen world. But during the whole of the period that the church is being gathered out there is an armistice; God's judgments will not fall upon the nations until he has taken away his own. You have to remember that this is the day of grace during which God is proclaiming to all men only the gospel of peace. He is reaching forth his hands declaring the grace of God during this dispensation; and that is God's great purpose in these days in which we are living.

You will find that when the acceptable year of the Lord ceases, that the day of vengeance of the Lord begins: the one immediately follows the other. When the last Jew or Gentile has been added to the church of God right out of this present state of things, then God's judgments will commence, but we are to be caught up into the air to meet the Lord on his return for the next part of the work. When the first moment of this day of vengeance comes, remember this, God's day of grace in order to gather out a people in the name of Jesus Christ, is passd away. There will be no addition to this church of God, for at the close of the day of Grace, the time for building up the church will have finished.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Dec. 17. Rev. 1: 5; John 15: 9-13.

ONE of Shakespeare's characters describing the sad death-bed scene of another, said that the dying man was continually talking of God, and added, "I, to comfort him, bade him not think of God." That has been the disposition for ages of all who have not known him. The thought of God as a Being of stern, inflexible justice, harsh, despotic, unsympathizing, has kept thousands from approaching him. It was the mission of Jesus to make him known as he really is. Already, those who had listened to the prophets knew that God was Almighty, Omniscient, Omnipresent, Righteous; but it remained for Christ to tell them he is Love. "After this manner pray ye, Our Father." And lest the conception of God should fail to take root in the minds of men Jesus gave us the measures contained in one of the passages of the Topic for the day: "As the Father hath loved me I have loved you; love one another as I have loved you." Thus love reaches from the highest to the lowest, and is to control all, in the strongest of all relations. And, as to its depth and intensity the gauge is furnished! "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." What love that is we can realize or ourselves. Cases are on record of men dying that another might live; and we wonder and admire such devotion. The Russian servant who stayed to do battle with the wolves while his master made good his escape; the father who answered to his son's name when the jailer in the French revolution was calling the roll of the condemned; the workman in the Welsh mine who bade his companion go up in the mine-elevator while he remained behind expecting to be blown to pieces in the impending explosion; are incidents that have been told again and again thrilling every hearer with admiration of the heroes. Many a man knows what it is to live for some one, to give toil and time and practice self-denial that his wife and children may be happy and be protected from privation. Some there are who believe that they could die if need were, if by dying they could help these loved ones. But it is the very acme and summit of devotion. Life is very dear and we cling to it. To voluntarily surrender it implies a motive stronger than any other that we are capable of feeling. This is the pledge of love that Christ has given the world. So we get a measure of our duty. As Christ loved us, so must we love. Is human nature capable of it? The question brings us to the secret of the power. The indwelling Christ, the spirit of Christ within, the very incarnation of Christ, as he was the incarnation of the Deity is the source of such love as we are expected to feel and show. "If Christ be in you," is the Apostolic suggestionr Then indeed all things are possible. What a transformed world this would be if that conception were realized! Wars would cease. Competition, the most Satanic product of our age would pass out of existence. Strikes would no longer be known. Oppression of all kinds would vanish. Poverty would no longer embitter life. Light and life and liberty would renovate the world if men would love one another as Christ loved them. As we dwell on the picture we pray with all our heart and soul, Thy kingdom come!

TO AID THE YOUNG WOMEN OF THE WEST.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Oakland, Cal., and the many visitors who go there in search of health for the restoration of their health have reason to be grateful for the devotion, sagacity, and energy of a band of Christian ladies in that city. These ladies have organized in a quiet, unostentatious way an association which [illegible] regularly incorporated Young Women's Christian Association, owning its own home, a picture of which appears on this page. The association organized, as all enterprises for the benefit of the people are apt to do, in the Church. Some sixteen years ago, a number of ladies held a meeting in the lecture room of the First Congregational Church to consider what could be done to help the young women of the city in their material, moral, and spiritual interests. The outcome of the meeting was the organization of the "Ladies Evangelical Philanthropical Society." A year's experience and an acquaintance with the Y.W. C. A. methods in operation in San Francisco led to a change in name and system, the object being the same as before. Several departments of work were already in existence, and these were extended. Sewing school, Helping Hand, Sheltering Home, Industrial, and City Missionary Committees were organized, and the society became the Young Women's Christian Association of Oakland.

The First Congregational Church continued its hospitality, a room in Tenth Street and another in Twenty-second Street were added to the quarters of the association, and in all three places the work of teaching and help was efficiently conducted. There was no question about its being appreciated. Young women soon perceived how valuable was the help afforded and how blessed were the results of the religious efforts made on their behalf. Those who came to learn shorthand, typewriting, dressmaking, or cooking found their way into the Bible classes and the devotional meetings, and learned, as the Apostle said, that "Godliness was profitable having the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." Ladies connected with other churches came to the help of the ladies of the Congregational church, and the Presbyterian, Methodist, Episcopal, and Baptist churches each furnished a contingent. The chief difficulty came from the widely scattered centres of work, and the idea of erecting a building which would accommodate them all was conceived and cherished.

It was not until 1889 that the idea took definite shape. One of the ladies who had given time and labor to the work and had seen how it had helped the girls, protecting them from temptation and giving them spiritual training, came into possession of a legacy and determined to devote it to the Association as a nucleus for a building fund. Encouraged by this foundation, the ladies set vigorously to work, and after months of toil and effort, the handsome building of which we give a picture here, has been built and furnished. The achievement is one of which the ladies have reason to be proud. It is well arranged with accommodations for physical culture classes, and for every department of the Association's work. The site cost $3,581; the building, $13,305, and $425 has so far been spent in furnishing. The work has been slow, for the ladies were determined to avoid debt and they have adhered to their determination. The President, Mrs. P. D. Browne, the Secretaries, Mrs. E. Wolfenden, Mrs. J. R. Scupham and Miss C. J. Bacon, aided by their colleagues, in various capacities, have labored during the past four years as if their own interests were involved, fully satisfied if they could see the enterprise they loved properly equipped for its work of helping their young sisters to become happier and more useful in their respective spheres.

So much has been already accomplished, and the Association is in so efficient a condition for still more beneficent work, that the effort the Association is now making to obtain funds for educational apparatus and the finishing of the furnishing deserves active sympathy and encouragement. The proverb which says that God helps those who help themselves, may or may not be true, but it is certain that the Christian public helps none more willingly or cheerfully than those who like these Oakland ladies have given freely of their money, time and labor to the cause whose claims they advocate. We most sincerely hope that the lack of the apparatus and other matters that is now restricting their work will be speedily met and the very small sum need to complete the equipment of this excellent institution will soon be in the treasurer's hands.

One of the chief features of each society is that all the members go out every week to preach the gospel to the heathen, and they do it with enthusiasm, too. And yet most of them are recently out of heathenism themselves; not one-half of them can read, and not one of them earns on an average more than five cents a day."

The Christian Herald's Thanksgiving

FEEDING HUNGRY HUNDREDS.

Succoring the Destitute and the Outcast —A Day Among "God's Poor."

IT was a real family Thanksgiving. Not one of those gatherings at which the guests assemble at tables that groan with the richest of viands, and where mirth and revelry rule the hour. No; for, strangely enough, this Thanksgiving, while it brought smiles, also brought not a few tears along with them. Its guests—and there were hundreds of them—wore no showy garments or brilliant gowns, and among them all there was not even a single jewel, unless one counted as such the glistening tear-drops that fell here and there from eyes shining with gratitude. Among those who were bidden to this Thanksgiving feast were the blind, the halt, the waifs, the homeless, the widows and orphans, the out-of-work, the poor stranger—in a word, the hungry and destitute wherever they could be found in street, alley, highway and byway. Not the lazy idle nor the professional tramp, but the deserving poor of two great cities. These were the guests at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Thanksgiving.

It was the second of our family Thanksgivings of the kind. That of last year, when several hundred poverty-stricken homes were temporarily brightened, had furnished an experience that was turned to good purpose in arranging for this new emergency. Within the radius of two miles on each side of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House there is a vast tenement population—especially on the east side. To the 600,000 poor in New York, the past season has been a terribly trying one, and the approach of winter finds thousands in a condition of want and suffering which it would be hard to exaggerate. To them, Thanksgiving has no joyous side. They have no share in the abundance of the rich man's table, and the sounds of mirth and frolic in cozy homes jar painfully upon their ears. Of all classes in the world, the honest poor, who, though enforced idleness or misfortune, have come to penury, are most to be pitied!

* * *

East and West, throughout the city, in tenement alley and slums, in cellars and garrets, the guests were sought out, only the most needy being chosen. And after much planning and purchasing, and a world of detail that need merely be referred to here, the arrangements were completed. First of all were the hunger-stricken refugee, Russian-Jewish families of the East Side, whose gaunt faces, hollow eyes and sunken cheeks made Essex, Norfolk, Grand, Attorney, Stanton, Rivington and adjacent streets seem like a haunt of human spectres. A thousand large loaves of fresh, wholesome bread found their way to the tables of 500 of the neediest families. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S bread-wagons went through those East-Side streets and the people swarmed about them on every side, it was no easy task to select the deserving; but a Christian gentleman, who had kindly volunteered to take charge of the distribution and who is thoroughly familiar with the entire district, proved equal to the emergency and the most deserving families were supplied with at least one staple ingredient of the Thanksgiving time.

THANKSGIVING AT THE WATER STREET MISSION.

AT THE BETHESDA HOME, BROOKLYN.

On the West Side, there is almost an equal amount of suffering, although of a different sort. Here the poor are not so demonstrative, and hide away from the public eye as much as possible. To search out the most urgent cases, where whole families were in absolute want, was the work of several days. In many homes not only food but clothing was wanting—table and wardrobe equally bare. It was thought best to supplement the gift of food with such articles as were most needed. Accordingly, sundry pairs of stout shoes, warm winter gloves and a few strong, durable suits of clothing for boys, with warm wraps for the mothers, took the place of the scanty apologies for garments they had previously worn.

Of course, that good old Christian, Mrs. Bella Cooke, who kindly aided THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with her counsels last Thanksgiving season, was not forgotten. Hundreds of "God's poor" look to her for help and comfort every year, and a number of these, whose names and addresses she gave, were this year supplied with a substantial dinner of juicy, corn-fed turkey. There were still other cases with peculiar needs. Invalids, whose slender purses could not afford even food enough for the children, were cheered with some jelly or other delicate trifle, in addition to something more substantial for the hale and hungry members of the household. In not a few tenement houses, where an ice-like chill pervaded the rooms, a gift of half a ton of coal infused warmth and a degree of cheerfulness. There were others—alas, that it should be so at the time of universal Thanksgiving! who had been threatened with dispossession from their humble quarters. Hundreds of such cases occur in New York in the hard winter months. But those in question were accompanied by unusual hardship. The last bond that kept the home together was threatened when the notices of dispossession were served, and before the dawn of Thanksgiving morning little piles of wretchedly poor, worn-out furniture on the sidewalk would have told the story of a group of shattered homes, with the almshouse as the destination of the parents and the children doomed to a pauper refuge. The payment of the rent to the landlord in those cases was a comparative trifle—at least, so it might seem to many; but to those stricken unfortunates it was like a gift from heaven itself, bringing new life and hope. It gave them back their homes, poor though they were, and made Thanksgiving in their hearts.

Thanksgiving evening showed another side to the picture and in some respects a brighter one. Down in the vilest part of Water street—where the late Jerry McAuley worked so long and faithfully for the Master among the outcasts—is the Water Street Mission. At the invitation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 150 persons were entertained at a Thanksgiving supper that evening and the occasion was one to be remembered. It was a plain, substantial meal, simple in all its details, but to the partakers, who were accustomed to the "hard side" of existence, and to whom every meal is a doubtful problem, it was a regal repast. Mr. S. H. Hadley, superintendent of the mission, presided with Mr. Franklin Smith as assistant. Charles Bernard, a convert and one of the most devoted members of the mission, had charge of the tables, which were loaded with great piles of meat and chicken sandwiches and bowls of steaming coffee. After a blessing had been asked by Mr. Hadley and the signal had been given to the waiters, the edibles vanished as if by magic. No Thanksgiving meal was more thoroughly enjoyed anywhere that day than that simple supper to the waifs and strays of poor fallen humanity in the Water Street Mission.

While these guests from the highways and byways were thus pleasantly engaged, similar scenes were taking place in the Home for the Friendless at 29 East Twenty-ninth street, where 220 children and forty adults sat down at 5 o'clock to supper. After a blessing had been asked by Rev. Geo. W. Mooney, Mrs. Rutgers, the matron, and Mrs. Leith, the housekeeper, placed an abundant and tempting meal before them, plain but wholesome, with plenty of everything, including fresh milk for the children, and cakes, oranges and apples, which seemed to give them especial delight. At the Margaret Strachan Home for friendless and fallen women, at 103 and 105 West Twenty-seventh street, forty-two guests, women and children sat down at 1 o'clock to share THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Thanksgiving, the Superintendent, Miss Maria Sibthorpe, presiding at the tables.

Over in Brooklyn, the inmates of the Bethesda Home for the Reclamation of Fallen Girls, twenty-five in number ate their CHRISTIAN HERALD Thanksgiving dinner. Mrs. Halvorson, the superintendent in charge, Rev. Chandler A. Oakes, the Assistant Pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, presided and invoked a blessing from the Giver of all good things.

THANKSGIVING WITH THE SICK.

We might tell also of individual cases where the Thanksgiving meal, unobtrusively supplied, was eaten in the privacy of humble homes; of widowed mothers, sick fathers whose hearts were gladdened by the gift of a turkey for the family whom they could no longer feed themselves; of the half-naked and barefooted tots who were made proud and happy possessors of stout shoes, of stockings and winter coats. In every instance the sparkle of gratitude in the eyes and the ready thanks that came to the lips showed how needed was the gift.

Such was the CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Family Thanksgiving. It was, to be sure, a rather large party, embracing altogether probably 1000 families, each with its little group of dependents—in all probably less than five thousand persons; yet it was an exceedingly pleasant and harmonious party. And if the experience has left in these bowed hearts and barren homes the grateful recollection of a day well spent and the conviction that, after all, God does not permit his poor to be forgotten, it will not have been undertaken in vain.

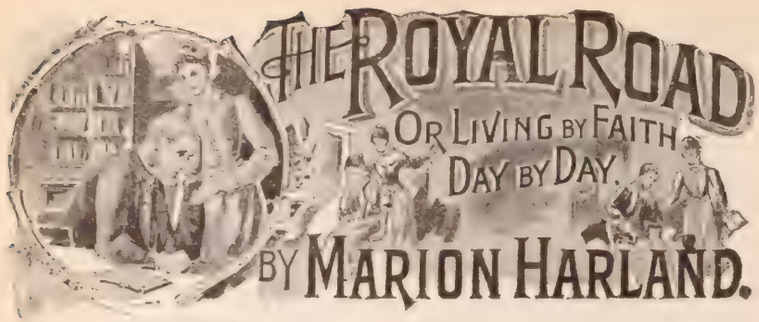
THE THANKSGIVING BREAD WAGON.

Ps. 10. 14 and 72: 12. The poor committeth himself unto thee: thou art the helper of the fatherless. . . . For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper.



CHAPTER I.

Hast thou, my Master, aught for me to do
[illegible]
Hast thou a word of love to some poor soul
That I may say?
For see! this world that thou hast made so fair
Within its heart is sad,
Thousands are lonely, thousands sigh and weep;
But few are glad.

—Elizabeth Prentiss.

MENDEBRAS Avenue is not in a fashionable quarter of Brooklyn. It is, however, unquestionably respectable. Many of the houses are of wood—evidences of a time, not many years back, when the district was one of numerous villages which have been overtaken and run down by the hurrying city. Such neighborhoods have a bewildered look and a general air of being ill-at-ease. So might stand and gape a group of country children surprised by a bevy of city cousins and invited to take part in their games.

The region about Mendebras avenue was especially confounded when the municipality raced up to it and swallowed it. Against its will, it was sliced into six blocks one way, and ten the other. There were once gardens there, and orchards, and commons, where carpets were beaten spring and fall, and the boys played ball on Saturdays. Before the march of improvement, brick houses in twos and threes and fours were wedged into the gardens; streets and avenues (Brooklyn is affluent in avenues) trampled the orchards out of sight and memory; each vacant lot was filled with tall rows of houses, some thinly-faced with brown stone, others of pressed brick in front, cheap brick in the rear. In certain streets most of these houses had several door-bells apiece. There were Nottingham lace curtains at the front windows, and the various tints of the Holland shades testified to the diverse tastes of the families occupying the several floors. The trees lining the sidewalks were generally poplars, a good deal the worse for years and wear, and supercilious young maples.

Trees were leafless, and the vines, clinging to the porches of the "old residents," leafless sticks, one November night when the street-lamps struggled conscientiously with a tawny fog that would bleach into rain as soon as it grew a little heavier. Right in the middle of a block, with a pair of new brown stone fronts crowding it on one side, and a time-blackened cottage giving it elbow-room, on the other, was the Jeremy Taylor Memorial Church. It belonged to the days when the district was a township, and had once stood in the centre of its own court. Middle-aged people could recollect the fine elms that shaded the western windows, now darkened by the cataract of the dead wall of the brown stone front. There were then tombstones in the quadrangle behind it, and the bell in the square tower rang out resonantly across green and garden.

It had rung twice on this evening, at seven and again at eight o'clock, it being prayer-meeting night.

The Jeremy Taylor people, as they called themselves—life being too brief in a fast-growing city for saying three words when two would do—were regular in attendance upon church ordinances. They said, complacently, that there were fewer "itching ears" among them than in the majority of Brooklyn congregations. A goodly number of them were from New England and "calculated" upon going to church as regularly as upon crossing the Ferry in the morning and coming home to supper at night. One pastor had folded and fed them for twenty-five years. He was "getting along" now—rising fifty years of age, but they craved nothing younger and livelier. They knew his ways and he knew theirs. Blessed is the people who is in such a case, and thrice-blessed the pastor.

The chapel was behind the church, an oblong room, plainly furnished with cushionless settees, a platform and desk, one arm-chair and a melodeon. The minister was of medium height, spare in build and wore eye-glasses. His coat was buttoned across a narrow chest, and, as many New York and Brooklyn preachers have a habit of doing, he cleared his throat of the catarrh-breeding fog frequently while speaking. Seventy-three people were present—a gratifying attendance for a wet night.

The pastor's wife was at the melodeon; in the ntervals of prayer and addresses, a gas-burner back of the pulpit hissed and blew alternately; the subsiding hum of the city was like the far-off roll of sullen surf. The air of the chapel, hot with furnace-breath, was yet humid, oppressing lungs and spirits. In a distant corner, a brother had succumbed to it, and snored intermittently, but under his breath, as befitted place and occasion.

The text of the lecture following the preliminary exercises was:

"Before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up into the faith which should afterwards be revealed."

The Rev. William C. Barnes constructed his discourses, major and minor, upon models received into a good and honest mind more than thirty years ago in Princeton Seminary, making liberal use of the stock ecclesiastical phrases which orthodox Bible students are supposed to comprehend. The men before him to-night belonged, one and all, to the mighty middle-class of the community. Every man of them worked for a living, and, without exception, worked hard. Back of each sedate visage were experiences in the battle of everyday life that would have astonished the owner's right and left-hand neighbor, had he revealed them. Their faces were criss-crossed by lines which were as truly scars as if made by a branding-iron. The women's faces were tired and discontented, or tired and resigned. Under one or the other of these types may be classed most of the countenances of native-born United States women. Of the fifty in the chapel that raw November night, perhaps forty "did their own work," and probably thirty-nine did it well. These are the true yoke-fellows who fill the settees at prayer-meetings, and seldom get leisure for other evening engagements. These are likewise they who do not drowse during the services, even when the lecture is upon Justification by Faith, The Perseverance of the Saints, or Reprobation. They are, as a body, too weary to do much thinking, and familiar platitudes glide, like bland warm oil, over rasped nerves. It does them good always to go to church, they will tell you with significance imperfectly comprehended by themselves. The House of God is to their soul the gate of heaven, be the ministrations of his earthly servants what they may. Gleams of light, sweet airs and snatches of celestial melody escape to them through gracious crevices in the blessed portals. There are calming influences in the voice of prayer, and refreshment in the dear old hymns.

Dr. Barnes was also tired to-night. He had made six pastoral calls in the afternoon, and in the morning gone to Cypress Hills cemetery behind the hearse of an utter stranger whose first cousin had, ten years ago, attended "the Jeremy Taylor" when she went anywhere. He had, according to his custom when he had an evening service, eaten no supper, spending the hour given by his family to that meal, in his study "thinking up" his lecture. When tired, he was didactic. Jaded memory did not go a field now for apt illustrations, and imagination dozed as stupidly as the brother in the distant corner. There was not the rise of an inch to the mile in the commonplaces of his comparison of the "Old, called the Mosaic Dispensation" with the "New, otherwise the Christian." He cited passages relative to the Law from the New Testament, until a hearer unversed in such matters might have inferred that every apostle was a member of the legal profession; he dwelt upon the impracticability of living up to the strict letter of the law, "rubbing it in," to steal a slang phrase, as if every tried and tempted parishioner had not had the terrible truth burned into his soul by a thousand failures; he described Faith in neat formulas learned from professors and note-books, and exhorted the impenitent—all within the sound of his voice being church-members in good and regular standing—to choose the better part, and begin the study and practice of saving faith before the judgment of the Law overtook them.

The Rev. William C. Barnes was a good man, sincere in belief and faithful in teaching, to the best of his ability. But he had conducted a prayer-meeting once a week for over a quarter of a century; and human nature is very human, mortal flesh very weak when weary.

The prayers, of which there were four besides the pastor's, were in the same key. To those who "offered" them, these services were likewise an oft-told tale. Had they ever heard the anecdote, each had he dared and had he been blest with a sense of humor, would have plagiarized the man who was so eloquent in public prayer that an admirer listened at his chamber-door one night in the hope of being edified by his secret devotions:

"Dear Lord!" sighed the disciple, as his head sank into his pillow—"Thou knowest how weary I am. Thou knowest, also, that we are on the same old terms!"

"There still remain three minutes before we close these exercises; said the leader's patient tones. "I hope the brethren will occupy the time."

It was obviously an economic, and not a devotional instinct, that drew the fourth brother to his feet to enunciate a prim ascription of praise, a confession of sins many and heinous; a thanksgiving for mercies received, and a supplication for a continuance of Divine favor. Men of his age and religious training, consciously or unconsciously, adopt the formula of devotion prescribed by an eminent teacher of "pastoral theology," wherein the monosyllable, ACTS, is indicated as a sacred combination for the lock of the Divine Treasure-chamber.

With an involuntary sigh, the patient pastor arose to announce the closing hymn. The time had been honestly occupied, but in nothing that had been uttered in prayer or exhortation had anybody followed his lead. They had danced dutifully, but not to the tune he had piped. For any reference that been made to the "line of his remarks," he might as well have preached like the old English clergyman of The Spectator, from "Adam; Seth; Enoch."

A sense of incongruity between the words, "We will conclude our services," and the perfunctory character of the exercises from beginning to end, had something to do with the sigh, and the undertone of pathos in which he read one stanza of the hymn he had selected:

I need Thee every hour,
Most gracious Lord!
No other voice like Thine
Can peace afford.

The melodeon stirred and spoke feelingly under the skilful touch of the minister's wife. She was the daughter of a wealthy man, had cultivated her musical talent in former days and never allowed the accomplishment to lapse into desuetude. The somnolent brother in the dim corner also stirred, and, mightily refreshed by his sojourn upon the Mount of Privilege, stood with the rest, with the over-acted aspect of, wide-awakeativeness which imposes upon no one the belief that Eutychus has found edification behind the drawn curtains of his eyes. Mrs. Barnes raised the tune with voice as with hand, nearly all of the little congregation singing with spirit, if not with understanding.

At the second verse, a new voice arose with startling effect, from a seat near the door. Dr. Barnes, supplying a light and original tenor to his wife's fine, true soprano, faltered on a high note in momentary surprise and glanced over his glasses towards the quarter whence the sound proceeded. Several other heads were turned in the same direction.

A woman of thirty-five or thereabouts, dressed in mourning, that, without being new or fashionable, did not detract from the impression of refinement conveyed by her face and carriage, stood there, removed from the rest of the audience by the width of two empty settees. Her hands, clapsed loosely upon one another, lay upon the back of the seat before her; her face was upraised slightly, her eyes were wide, and fixed upon a point above the pastor's head. It was plain that she was removed in thought, no less than in body from human companionship; her voice was full and rich, with that indescribable vibrant quality we call "carrying well," but it was the passionate fervor of appeal, the cry of the soul in every note that went to the listener's ear and heart:

I need Thee every hour!
Stay Thou near by;
Temptations lose their power
When Thou art nigh.

It rose and swelled in the chorus like the call of grieving earth to a pitying heaven:

I need Thee, O I need Thee!
Every hour I need Thee!
O, bless me now, my Saviour!
I come to Thee.

With the thrilling echo still calling to the depths of his soul, the pastor bowed his head to pronounce the benediction. When he raised it, the back seat was empty.

Two of the deacons were waiting for him in the vestibule when he came out. After a word of greeting, he inquired, with a professional interest, if either of them had noticed a lady dressed in black who sat in the last seat of the chapel, quite close to the door.

"She has a remarkably fine voice, as I observed in the singing of the last hymn. But my attention was first drawn to her by her manner of listening to the lecture. I do not think she lost one word of it," he subjoined, with the frank vanity which, although not confined to men of his calling, is seldom so outspoken in other professions. "She has an intelligent face and one that seemed strangely familiar to me. I have probably seen her in some other church when I have exchanged pulpits with some of my New York or Brooklyn brethren. Should she come to us again, we must look her up. We cannot be too attentive to the stranger within our gates."

Neither of the deacons had noticed the stranger until they were singing the last hymn, and neither had any idea who she was. Both agreed with Dr. Barnes that she had a wonderful voice, and one thought she "sang like a professional."

When they turned up the street, and Dr. and Mrs. Barnes down, the latter had something to say.

"I saw that woman when she came into the chapel." Belonging to a more modern and less formal school than her husband, she said "woman" instead of "lady." Being one of the laity, she had no flattering delusions upon another point. "But I don't agree with you in thinking that she listened attentively to the lecture. She kept her eyes on you, yet it looked to me more like the polite trick of a well-bred person, accustomed to appear interested in a speaker, than real hearing and thinking of what one hears. She has an eager, intense face, and, unless I am greatly mistaken in her physiognomy, she is intensely miserable. I never saw a sadder gaze. Her mourning is not new, so her trouble must be of some other kind. I don't believe, moreover, that she is in the habit of attending prayer-meetings regularly. She just happened into ours, in passing. She did not come in until after the second hymn, and dropped into the first seat she came to. There was a hunted look about her that struck me at once, and, combined with the impression that I had seen her before, made me uneasy. It set me to thinking of stories I have read of women meditating suicide who stole into churches on the way to the river. I was glad that you gave out that last hymn, and her way of singing it confirmed me in the idea that it was just the word in season for her."

"Upon my word, Annie, you seem to have made more use of your eyes than of your ears during service." Dr. Barnes had an excellent disposition and was loyally fond of his bright help-meet, but one or two things in this speech grated upon his ear. "While I make no pretensions to being an entertaining preacher, it is within the range of possibility that this stranger, who, I am convinced, has heard me somewhere before, may have followed my humble remarks with more attention than you imagine probable."

"My dear William! I assure you—"

"I have the floor, I believe, my love!" with a vexed little laugh and a show of extreme politeness: "I was about to question if it is consistent with Christian charity of thought,—as practised by men at least,—to jump to the conclusion that every woman who comes late to prayer-meeting and has the bad taste to listen intently to what is said and look solemn after a searching, practical discourse, must, of necessity, be an abandoned creature bent upon self-murder."

Sensible Mrs. Barnes, a clergyman's wife of over a score of years' standing, recalling to mind that her spouse had had a trying day and was still fasting, quickened her pace a little, and glanced up solicitously.

"HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS."

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

"BLACK yer boots, mister. Shine 'em up—only a nickel." Such were the cries that greeted me from half a dozen boot-blacks as I came through the ferry gates with my boots loaded down with New Jersey mud. Never did barnacles stick to the bottom of a vessel more tenaciously, or politician hold on to office with a tighter grip, than did that mud cling to my boots. And never did flies scent a barrel of sugar more quickly than that horde of boot-blacks discovered my mud-laden extremities. They swooped down upon me with their piercing cries, until many of my fellow-passengers gazed on my boots with looks that seemed to rebuke me for my temerity in daring to bring such a large amount of soil to add to the already over-stocked supply of the city. My very boots seemed to plead with me to let one of those boys relieve them of the load that weighed them down. But, behold my dilemma—six persistent, lusty, vociferous boys clamoring for one job, while I, as arbiter, must deal out elation to one boy, and dejection to the other five.

"JOE."

"Silence! Fall into line for inspection!" Behold my brigade, standing in line, and no two of them alike in size, feature or dress. All looked eager, and five of them looked at my boots and pointed their index fingers at the same objects. The sixth boy held up his head in a manly way and looked me in the eye. I looked him over and was affected in two ways. His clothes touched my funny bone and made me laugh before I knew it. If those pants had been made for that boy, then since that time had there been a great growth in that boy or a great shrinkage in the pants. But, if the pants were several sizes too small and fit him too little, the coat was several sizes too large and fit him too much, so that his garments gave him the appearance of being a small child from his waist down, and an old man from his waist up. The laugh that came as my sense of humor was touched, instantly ceased as I saw the flush that came to the boy's face. The other five boys wanted to get at my boots, but this one had got at my heart, and I made up my mind he should get at my boots as well, and straightway made known my decision. This at once brought forth a volley of jibes and jeers, and cutting remarks. "Oh, 'His Royal Highness' gets the job, and he will be prouder and meaner than ever, he will. Say, mister, he's too proud to live, he is. He thinks he owns the earth, he does."

The flush deepened on the boy's face, and I drove his assailants away ere I let him begin his work.

"Now, my boy, take your time, and you shall have extra pay for the job; pardon me for laughing at you; don't mind those boys, but tell me why they call you 'His Royal Highness?'"

He gazed up in my face a moment with a hungry look, and I said, "you can trust me."

"Well, sir, they thinks I'm proud and stuck-up, 'cause I won't pitch pennies and play 'craps' with 'em, and they says I'm stingy and trying to own the earth, 'cause I won't chew tobacco and drink beer, or buy the stuff for 'em. They says my father must be a king, for I wears such fashionable clothes, and puts on so many airs, but that I run away from home 'cause I wanted to boss my father and be king myself. So they calls me 'His Royal Highness.'"

There was a tremble in his voice as he paused a moment, and then he continued:

"If I ever had a father, I never seen him, and if I ever had a mother, I wish someone would tell me who she was. How can a feller be proud and stuck-up who ain't got no father, and no mother, and no name only Joe? They calls me stingy 'cause I'm saving all the money I can, but I ain't saving it for myself—I'm saving it for Jessie."

"Is Jessie your sister?" I asked.

"No, sir; I ain't got no relatives."

"Perhaps, then, she is your sweetheart," I said.

Again he looked up in my face and said very earnestly, "Did you ever know a boot-black without any name to have an angel for a sweetheart?"

His eyes were full of tears, and I made no answer, though I might have told him I had found a boot-black who had a big, warm heart even if he had no sweetheart. Very abruptly he said:

"You came over on the boat; what kind of a land is it over across the river?"

"It is very pleasant in the country," I replied.

"Is it a land of pure delight, where saints immortal reign?"

"I TAKES HER A FLOWER EVERY NIGHT."

Having just come from New Jersey where the infamous race track, and the more infamous rum-traffic legalized by law, would sink the whole state in the Atlantic Ocean, if it were not that it had a life preserver in Ocean Grove, I was hardly prepared to vouch for it being that kind of a land.

"Why do you ask that?" I said.

"Because I hear Jessie sing about it so much, and when I asked her about it, she said it's a land where there's green fields, and flowers that don't wither, and rivers of delight, and where the sun always shines, and she wants to go there so much. I has'nt told anybody about it before, but I eats as little as I can and gets along with these clothes what made you laugh at me, and I'm saving up my money to take Jessie to that land of pure delight just as soon as I gets enough. Does yer know where that land is?"

"I think I do, my boy, but you haven't told me yet who Jessie is."

"Jessie's an angel, but she's sick. She lives up in a room in the tenement, and I lives in the garret near by. She ain't got no father, and her mother don't get much work, for she can't go out to work and take care of Jessie, too. She cries a good deal when Jessie don't see her, 'cause she thinks she is going to lose Jessie, but over in that land of pure delight, Jessie says nobody is sick, and everybody who goes there gets well right away, and, oh sir, I wants to take Jessie there just as soon as I can. I takes her a flower every night, and then I just sits and looks at her face, until my heart gets warmer and warmer, and do yer think I could come out of such a place and then swear, and drink, and chew tobacco, and pitch pennies, and tell lies? I tells Jessie how the boys calls me 'His Royal Highness,' and she tells me I musn't mind it, and I musn't get mad, but just attend to my work. And—and—and, oh sir, I wanted to tell somebody all this, for I always tries to look bright when I goes in to see Jessie, and not let her know I am fretting about anything; but I does want to take Jessie to the land where flowers always bloom and people are always well. That's so little for me to do after all the good that's come to me from knowing Jessie. But, I begs yer pardon for keeping yer so long, and I thanks yer for letting me tell yer about Jessie."

Ah, the boys named him better than they knew, for here was a prince in truth, and despite his rags "His Royal Highness" was a more befitting name than Joe.

"Where does Jessie live, my boy?"

"Oh, sir, yer isn't going to take Jessie to that land of pure delight, and spoil all my pleasure. I does want to do it myself. Yer won't be so mean as that, after listening to what I've been telling yer, will yer?"

"Not I, my boy, not I. Just let me go and see Jessie and her mother, and whatever I can do for them, I'll do it through you."

A little persuasion, and then "His Royal Highness" and I made our way to the tenement and began climbing the stairs. We had gone up five flights and were mounting the sixth, when the boy stopped suddenly and motioned for me to listen. The voice of a woman reached my ear—a voice with deep grief in every tone—saying, "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble." A pause—then a sob—and the voice wailing rather than singing:

Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on thee;
Leave, Oh leave me, not alone,
Still support and comfort me.
All my trust on thee is stayed,
All my help from thee I bring;
Cover my defenceless head,
With the shadow of thy wing.

The boy grasped my hand a moment—gasped out "that's Jessie's mother, something's happened"—and then bounded up the stairs and into the room. I followed him and found sure enough something had happened, for Jessie had gone to the land of pure delight, and the mother stood weeping beside her dead. On the face of Jessie lingered a smile, for she was well at last. In her hand was a pure white rosebud, the last flower Joe had carried to her the evening before. Her last message to him was that she had gone to the land of pure delight, and for him to be sure and follow her there.

I draw the curtain over the boy's grief. His savings bought the coffin in which Jessie was laid under the green sod. Where "His Royal Highness" is, must for the present remain a secret between Joe and myself. His face and his feet are turned toward the land of pure delight. His heart is there already. You have his story, and it may help you to remember that some paupers wear fine linen and broadcloth, while here and there a prince is to be found clothed in rags.

CHRIST.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

IN the opening of the dawning
Find ye him the shepherds sought?
Is the glory of the morning
With his image interwrought?

Does the halo from the manger
Fill the world from pole to pole?
Does the humble, earth-born stranger,
Find a home within your soul?

Then, the Saviour, meek and lowly,
Is this morning born again;
Then the God-man, pure and holy,
Is indeed the Christ of men!

Two Things about Catarrh in the Head

First—It is a constitutional disease. Prof. Gross, a leading scientist, says: "Catarrh is a constitutional disease which manifests itself by local symptoms." Dr. Dio Lewis says: "Catarrh is not a disease of the man's nose; it is a disease of the man." Therefore he says snuffs and other local applications are useless.

Second—It requires a constitutional remedy, like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which reaches and cures Catarrh by purifying the blood and building up the system, so as to throw off the disease. Thousands who formerly suffered from Catarrh agree that bands of natives belonging to distant tribes as far north as Bangweolo and south to Lake Ngami, but who occupy land supposed to be within Lewanika's dominions, and by these delegates send the annual tribute he claims. In this way the opportunity was afforded me of seeing representatives of several tribes that were but little known to the civilized world. This over, the king returns to his wattle-and-daub palace in state, and I to my hut. Would that it were to spend a quiet night! But not while ancestral worship is the religion, if religion it may be called, of the Marotsi nation, can be expected other than 'a sound of revelry by night,' their theory being that, although their ancestors have departed this life, their spirits still haunt the scenes of their earthly career, potent to wreak vengeance on those who may have incurred their displeasure."

Dr. Johnston gives this gloomy picture of the Livingstonia mission: "I went ashore to see the Livingstonia mission station, where a native teacher is in charge, and I am informed, doing a good work among the children of the district. He is a quiet, sensible, unassuming man. There are several large buildings composing the mission premises. These are the results of the early labors of white missionaries, who were one after another cut off by fever, four or five during as many years, including the lamented Dr. William Black, the position of whose grave is indicated by a bronze medallion and tablet. This was sufficient warning not to persist in occupying the stations by Europeans; for though planted in a lovely spot, environed by granite mountains, clad to the summit with small trees, it is but a few feet above the level of the lake, hence a very hot-bed of malarial exhalations. The survivors decided to transfer the mission center to Bandawe."

Regarding the Batokas, Mangwatos, Bushmen, Makalakas, Matabeles, and Mashonas, the traveler records some interesting facts. The glittering stories of the great wealth and agricultural riches of Mashonaland he declares to be exaggerations.

Much of the volume is devoted to criticism of mission methods. Concerning voluntary missionaries, of whom there are many in Africa, Dr. Johnston writes: "Not every one who may choose to volunteer need expect to succeed. If his labors have been unsuccessful at home, they will be more so here where the hindrances are infinitely greater. Special fitness or adaptability is required of a man who would be a pioneer of missions in Africa. We cannot see with those who advocate the sending out of young, unmarried ladies to Central Africa, except to well established stations, their position being so misunderstood by the natives."

Concerning some of Dr. Johnston's criticisms of mission work at certain stations, it may be remarked that they cannot be regarded as important. It is not reasonable that a person who has never before been in Africa, should be in a position to pass final judgment upon the work and motives of men who have devoted years of consecrated effort to the African field, knowing its perils and hardships and yet daring all for the sake of Him whom they serve. It is not unlikely that many of the missionaries have received similar impressions to those experienced by Jr. Johnston, on first entering the field, but patience and experience have shown them the danger as well as the injustice of a too hasty judgment. At the same time, it is unquestionable that he has opened up a subject of vital consequence to missions in general and to African missions in particular, when he declares that the time has arrived for a "full, free and dispassionate discussion" of these matters. His chief points are: 1. That there should be no misrepresentation or exaggeration about missionary results; 2. that a "few object lessons in toil and suffering" cannot convert the world; 3. that missionaries everywhere ought to be paid and not be compelled to waste valuable time in the mere fight for subsistence; 4. that theories in mission work should give place to the methods approved by absolute experience; 5. that medical knowledge is a distinct advantage in the work. In the closing chapters of his book he indicates a number of fields for mission work which seemed to him to be needy and promising. He outlines a method which if adopted in the establishment of stations, he believes would result in practical benefit as well as in saving the lives of missionaries who would inevitably be sacrificed under other conditions. Dr. Johnston's book will be read with general interest and no little profit by actual and intending missionaries, as well as by their supporters at home.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

From the London "Christian Herald."

"MR. CONGREVE ON CONSUMPTION, &c., &c."

"Our attention has been called to a pamphlet on the treatment of this terrible malady, and on asthma and diseases of the lungs in general, by Mr. Geo. Thos. Congreve, of Coombe Lodge, Peckham—a Christian gentleman, well known to most of our leading ministers, Mr. Spurgeon among the rest, who at a recent meeting spoke very highly of him, stating that many members of his Church and students of his College had consulted him with remarkable success. One instance in Mr. Congreve's work deserving special notice is that of Rev. James Smith, formerly of the College, and pastor of Redhill Church, and now of York Road Church, Leeds, who was restored after the case had been pronounced hopeless. Other extraordinary cases are related by Mr. Spurgeon's first student (Rev. T. W. Medhurst, of Portsmouth), and many more from ministers too numerous to mention.

"The author has studied the subject for many years both at the London hospitals and with his father, and in a private sphere of observation, enlarging year by year. We are glad to hear of his continued success, and confidently recommend a perusal of the work, that the afflicted may judge for themselves.

"The fatality of Consumption in this country has been strange and fearful. We know not anything more painful in the annals of disease than the premature and rapid decline of the young, who, having for twenty years, more or less, enjoyed health and vigor, are smitten down like a fragile flower, the mental powers remaining for the most part unimpaired. The author truly says in his opening chapter:—

> "'The flower in ripened bloom unmatched
> Must fall the earliest prey;
> Though by no hand untimely snatched,
> The leaves must droop away;
> And yet it were a greater grief
> To watch it with'ring leaf by leaf,
> Than see it plucked to-day.'

"'How many a fond parent's hopes have been blasted by this cruel malady, who can tell? How many a lovely girl bursting into beauty, the object of a father's delight and a mother's care, has drooped away—withering like a flower, leaf by leaf, not plucked by untimely hand, but wasted by an influence unsuspected because unseen. There has been a bright flush on the cheek, boding no good, remarked only by the professional eye. There has been a languishing into outward loveliness, while there has been death and decay within. Unconscious of the danger of that slight cough and very trifling pain, they have allowed the foe to pursue his secret march, until the mischief done is past all hope of remedy by common means.'

[Here the reviewer continues with a further quotation from the introductory chapter, which need not be inserted here.]

"Mr. Congreve's work proceeds to trace the 'Causes of disease, forebodings of danger, the sad reality, the first and second stages, then the last or closing scene,' of which Kirke White, the Christian poet, himself a victim, writes:—

> "'Gently, most gently, on thy victims head,
> Consumption, lay thine hand. Let me decay
> Like the expiring lamp.'

"Then rapidly sketching out and disposing of various 'Fallacies of Treatment,' he shows by incontrovertible argument that this terrible malady is 'curable' by judicious treatment and proper auxiliary means, when the lungs are not wholly wasted, and that no case should be abandoned in hopeless despair. To this are added valuable chapters on 'Diet, Air, Exercise, &c., &c.'

"Mr. Congreve gives about sixty selected cases, running over past years. The more new and recent cases, we believe, are given from time to time in the various advertisements (that is, we presume, some of the more important ones); many who derive great benefit, unfortunately, object to their names appearing.

"We believe that Mr. Congreve's remedies are not expensive in any case, the cost being less than £1 per month; and our readers will gather from the last two letters quoted that his charges are reduced to much less for the very poor. At the close of his treatise he states what his practice has proved: 'I am not solely actuated by ideas of pecuniary gain; but a desire to benefit my fellow-creatures as much as my own advantage has induced me to publish these remedies to the world.'

"Mr. Congreve has long been known as a friend and helper of Sunday-schools. He has a class of more than a hundred young women, and is superintendent of a school of 900 scholars, also a respected deacon of the church at Rye Lane. He is the author of a Sunday-school Hymn Book, called "Gems of Song," of which nearly a million copies have been sold. At a public meeting, on June 1, a testimonial was presented to him by the Church and School, consisting of a beautiful bust by Mr. A. C. Rixon, with a marble pedestal. The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon was in the chair, and the Revs. J. T. Wigner, W. Sampson, G. B. Ryley, and others, were present."

The establishing by Mr. G. T. Congreve, of a permanent office in America and the publication here of his celebrated treatise, showing that Consumption is curable, opens a new era of life to poor sufferers who may have given up hope, but who have now the opportunity for restoration given to them by following the very simple treatment prescribed. It has restored many thousands of English people who were at death's door, but who are now enjoying vigorous, happy, healthy lives, through the timely following of his instruction:

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 900 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many druggists, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $2.50, $4.75 or $9.00 according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE RAGGED SCHOOLS OF LONDON.

John Pounds, the Portsmouth Cobbler, and his Work among the Waifs—How it has borne fruit in a Great Benevolent and Educational System.

A LITTLE more than fifty years ago, rough but kind-hearted John Pounds, a crippled cobbler of Portsmouth, England, might have been seen in his shop long before daylight. He had particular work to do before taking up his awls and last and lapstone for the day's work for the old man was a bit of a philanthropist. All the stray and homeless boys around knew the sunny face and kindly-spoken cobbler, and they liked to eat a hot breakfast in his shop and listen to the merry music of the song-birds that hung about in the willow cages.

Then Pounds had a wealth of stories to tell—stories such as the lads loved to hear; tales of the helpful sort, that made them all feel better for the hearing. And they would sit beside the lame cobbler by the hour, listening while he talked or reading to him while his strong, quick fingers were busy with his work. Not all of them could read, it is true; but old John Pounds helped the stumblers along as they picked out the words with difficulty, and even explained the meaning.

When the cobbler took a holiday—a rare treat for him—he took the boys with him on his rambles. Those were red-letter days! He would charm them with his chat, and he seemed to know everything, for Pounds had been an omnivorous reader, and was both botanist and naturalist. Besides, he had an idea that boys should eat as well as learn, and on every such excursion, he took along a well-filled lunch bag with sandwiches, apples and nuts, to the intense enjoyment of the lads, to whom a substantial meal was a luxury indeed. Pound's lunch-bag was a source of wonder and delight.

By-and-by, the idea grew in the cobbler's mind that some organized effort was needed to help the children, if they were to be saved from ignorant and vicious lives. He did what he could, but he was painfully conscious of the inadequacy of his efforts. It was like stopping a river with straws. He felt that something was due from society to those waifs, and that society must be made to know it. Accordingly with what little help he could muster he started what was really the first Ragged School in existence. Children of both sexes attended—lost little ones, for whom nobody seemed to care—and he took them into his shop, fed them, warmed them, taught them and gave them almost a parent's love.

After a time, others came to his help, but up to the day of his death on January 1, 1839, John Pounds may be said to have stood almost alone in the great battle for the ragged children. His death, and the public interest in his work which that event aroused, led to one of the greatest philanthropic movements of the present century — the formation of the Ragged School Union.

Although London probably holds the largest number of poor of any city, it is equally true that the "drift children" of that great metropolis are better cared for than those of most other large centres of population. Five years after the death of John Pounds, the Ragged School Union was founded in London by Lord Shaftesbury and a number of other earnest Christian men, who had the interest of the waifs at heart. The Ragged School Union now numbers 204 institutions or missions, scattered throughout London and its suburbs. The spiritual work of the Union embraces 241 Sunday Schools, 245 Bible Classes, 214 Prayer-meetings and Children's Services, and it has, besides, 21 Free Day Schools, 74 Night Schools and 90 Industrial Classes in which both boys and girls are taught to use their hands and heads, 71 Penny Banks, 141 Libraries, 41 Boys' and Girls' Institutes and Recreation Classes, 68 Mens' and Boys' Clubs and Gymnasiums, eight Foundling Homes and nine Shoe Black Brigades, besides forty-two Clothing Clubs, for supplying the poor with garments, and a large number of Men's Clubs of various kinds. Its benevolent work includes a great variety of agencies, chiefly carried on in the winter months, when work is dull and sickness abundant. This work consists of relieving the distressed and clothing the naked.

MR. JOHN KIRK.
Secretary, Ragged School Union, London, England.

Every winter, between 50,000 and 75,000 meals are provided to poor families through the Union's direct agencies, and over half a million individuals are fed in the year through the schools. In the same time, many thousands of garments, pairs of shoes and blankets are distributed among the needy poor. To accomplish this work requires the services of a very large number of persons, and it is therefore not surprising to learn that the Union has among its workers 4095 voluntary teachers and aids, seventy-three pay teachers and several hundred helpers who co-operate in making clothing, collecting funds, giving meals, lectures, concerts, etc. This army of loving workers is recruited from every rank of society, the highest and the humblest, all striving harmoniously to save and train the 50,000 poor children who come annually under their care.

In a thousand different ways, the Ragged School Union does a wonderful work among the children of the poor, and through the children, among the adults also. It has been the means, to a certain extent, of cleansing the old-time rookeries, and the present generation is reaping the benefit of the social reformation begun fifty years ago by the old Portsmouth cobbler. The Ragged Schools no longer meet in cellars, basements, or bare-looking, uncomfortable rooms, but in comfortable and attractive quarters. The Ragged School Union is the ally of the School Board and the friend of social purity, good government and religion. The late Lord Shaftesbury estimated that the Union had been instrumental in saving 300,000 young persons from lapsing into crime! Its branches and affiliated or-

UNHORSED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning at Birmingham, Ala.

Text: Acts 9: 3-5, "As he journeyed, he came near Damascus: and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven; and he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And he said, Who art thou Lord? And the Lord said: I am Jesus whom thou persecutest."

THE Damascus of Bible times still stands, with a population of one hundred and thirty-five thousand. It was a gay city of white and glistering architecture, its minarets and crescents and domes playing with the light of the morning sun; embowered in groves of olive, and citron, and orange, and pomegranate; a famous river plunging its brightness into the scene; a city by the ancients styled "a pearl surrounded by emeralds."

A group of horsemen are advancing upon that city. Let the Christians of the place hide, for that cavalcade coming over the hills is made up of persecutors; their leader small and unattractive in some respects, as leaders sometimes are insignificant in person: witness the Duke of Wellington and Dr. Archibald Alexander. But there is something very intent in the eye of this man of the text, and the horse he rides is lathered with the foam of a long and quick travel of one hundred and thirty-five miles. He urges on his steed, for those Christians must be captured and silenced, and that religion of the cross must be annihilated. Suddenly the horses shy off, and plunge until the riders are precipitated. Freed from the riders, the horses bound snorting away. You know that dumb animals, at the sight of an eclipse, or an earthquake, or anything like a supernatural appearance, sometimes become very uncontrollable. A new sun had been kindled in the heavens, putting out the glare of the ordinary sun. Christ with the glories of heaven wrapped about him, looked out from a cloud and the splendor was insufferable, and no wonder the horses sprang and the equestrians dropped. Dust-covered and bruised, Saul attempts to get up, shading his eyes with his hands from the severe lustre of the heavens, but unsuccessfully, for he is struck stone blind as he cries out, "Who art thou, Lord?" and Jesus answered him, "I am the one you have been chasing. He that whips and scourges those Damascene Christians, whips and scourges me. It is not their back that is bleeding; it is mine. It is not their heart that is breaking; it is mine. I am Jesus whom thou persecutest."

From that wild, exciting, and overwhelming scene there rises up the greatest preacher of all the ages—Paul, in whose behalf prisons were rocked down, before whom soldiers turned pale, into whose hand Mediterranean sea-captains put control of their storm-wrecking craft, and whose epistles are the avant courier of a resurrection-day.

I learn from this scene that a worldly fall sometimes precedes a spiritual uplifting. A man does not get much sympathy by falling off a horse. People say he ought not to have got into the saddle if he could not ride. Those of us who were brought up in the country remember well how the workmen laughed when [illegible] suddenly lost our ride. When in a Grand Review a general toppled from the stirrups it became a national merriment. Here is Paul [illegible] with government documents in his pocket, a graduate of a most famous school in which the celebrated Dr. Gamaliel had been a professor, perhaps having already attained two of the three titles of the school—Rab, the first; Rabbi, the second; and on his way to Rabbak, the third and highest title. I know from his temperament that his horse was ahead of the other horses. But without time to think of what posture he should take, or without consideration for his dignity, he is tumbled into the dust. And yet that was the best ride Paul ever took. Out of that violent fall he arose into the apostleship. So it has been in all ages and so it is now.

You will never be worth much for God and the Church until you lose your fortune, or have your reputation upset, or in some way, somehow, are thrown and humiliated. You must go down before you go up. Joseph finds his path to the Egyptian court through the pit into which his brothers threw him. Daniel would never have walked amidst the bronzed lions that adorned the Babylonish throne if he had not first walked amidst the real lions of the cave. And Paul marshals all the generations of Christendom by falling flat on his face on the road to Damascus. Men who have been always prospered may be efficient servants of the world, but will be of no advantage to Christ. You may ride majestically seated on your charger, rein in hand, foot in stirrup, but you will never be worth anything spiritually until you fall off. They who graduate from the school of Christ with the highest honors have on their diploma the seal of a lion's muddy paw, or the plash of an angry wave, or the drop of a stray tear, or the brown scorch of a persecuting fire. In nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand there is no moral or spiritual elevation until there has been a thorough worldly upsetting.

THE HOUSE OF ANANIAS IN DAMASCUS.
Where Paul was taken after his conversion

Again, I learn from the subject that the religion of Christ is not a pusillanimous thing. People in this day try to make us believe that Christianity is something for men of small calibre, for women with no capacity to reason, for children in the infant class under six years of age, but not for stalwart men. Look at this man of the text! Do you not think that the religion that could capture such a man as that must have some power in it? He was a logician, he was a metaphysician, he was an all-conquering orator, he was a poet of the highest type. He had a nature that could swamp the leading men of his own day, and, hurled against the Sanhedrim, he made it tremble. He learned all he could get in the school of his native village; then he had gone to a higher school, and there mastered the Greek and the Hebrew, and perfected himself in belles-lettres, until in after years he astonished the Cretans, and the Corinthians, and the Athenians, by quotations from their own authors. I have never found anything in Carlyle, or Goethe, or Herbert Spencer, that could compare in strength or beauty with Paul's Epistles. I do not think there is anything in the writings of Sir William Hamilton that shows such mental discipline as you find in Paul's argument about justification and the resurrection. I have not found anything in Milton finer in the way of imagination than I can find in Paul's illustrations drawn from the amphitheatre. There was nothing in Robert Emmet pleading for his life, or in Edmund Burke arraigning Warren Hastings in Westminster Hall, that compared with the scene in the court-room, when before robed officials Paul bowed and began his speech, saying, "I think myself happy, King Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day." I repeat, that a religion that can capture a man like that must have some power in it. It is time you stopped talking as though all the brain of the world were opposed to Christianity. Where Paul leads, we can afford to follow. I am glad to know that Christ has in the different ages of the world had in his discipleship a Mozart and a Handel in music; a Raphael and a Reynolds in painting; an Angelo and a Canova in sculpture; a Rush and a Harvey in medicine, a Grotius and a Washington in statesmanship; a Blackstone, a Marshall, and a Kent in law; and the time will come when the religion of Christ will conquer all the observatories and universities, and Philosophy will through her telescope behold the morning star of Jesus, and in her laboratory see "that all things work together for good," and with her geological hammer discover the "Rock of Ages." Oh, instead of cowering and shivering when the sceptic stands before you and talks of religion as though it were a pusillanimous thing—instead of that, take your New Testament from your pocket and show him the picture of the intellectual giant of all the ages, prostrated on the road to Damascus while his horse is flying wildly away; then ask your sceptic what it was that frightened the one and threw the other? Oh no, it is no weak Gospel. It is a glorious Gospel. It is an all-conquering Gospel. It is an omnipotent Gospel. It is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation.

Again, I learn from the text a man cannot become a Christian until he is unhorsed. The trouble is, we want to ride into the kingdom of God, just as the knight rode into castle gate on palfrey, beautifully caparisoned. We want to come into the kingdom of God in fine style. No kneeling down at the altar, no sitting on "anxious seats," no crying over sin, no begging at the door of God's mercy. Clear the road, and let us come in all prancing in the pride of our soul. No, we will never get into heaven that way. We must dismount. There is no knight-errantry in religion, no fringed trappings of repentance, but an utter prostration before God, a going down in the dust, with the cry, "Unclean, unclean!"—a bewailing of the soul, like David from the belly of hell—a going down in the dust, until Christ shall by his grace lift us up as he lifted Paul. Oh, proud-hearted hearer, you must get off that horse. May a light from the throne of God brighter than the sun throw you! Come down into the dust and cry for pardon, and life, and heaven.

Again, I learn from this scene of the text that the grace of God can overcome the persecutor. Christ and Paul were boys at the same time in different villages, and Paul's antipathy to Christ was increasing. He hated everything about Christ. He was going down then with writs in his pockets to have Christ's disciples arrested. He was not going as a sheriff goes, to arrest a man against whom he had no spite, but Paul was going down to arrest those people because he was glad to arrest them. The Bible says, "He breathed out slaughter." He wanted them captured, and he wanted them butchered. I hear the click, and clash, and clatter of the hoofs of the galloping steeds on the way to Damascus. Oh! do you think that proud man on horseback can ever become a Christian? Yes! there is a voice from heaven like a thunder-clap uttering two words, the second word the same as the first, but uttered with more emphasis, so that the proud equestrian may have no doubt as to who is meant, "Saul! Saul!" That man was saved, and he was a persecutor; and so God can by his grace overcome any persecutor. The days of sword and fire for Christians seem to have gone by. The bayonets of Napoleon I. pried open the "Inquisition" and let the rotting wretches out. The ancient dungeons around Rome are to-day mere curiosities for the travelers. The Coliseum, where wild beasts used to suck up the life of the martyrs while the emperor watched and Lolia Paulina sat with emerald adornments worth sixty million sesterces, clapping her hands as the Christians died under the paw and the tooth of the lion—that Coliseum is a ruin now. The scene of the Smithfield fires is a hay-market. The day of fire and sword for Christians seems to have gone by; but has the day of persecution ceased? No. Are you not caricatured for your religion? In proportion as you try to serve God and be faithful to him, are you not sometimes maltreated? That woman finds it hard to be a Christian, as her husband talks and jeers while she is trying to say her prayers or read the Bible. That daughter finds it hard to be a Christian with the whole family arrayed against her—father, mother, brother, and sister making her the target of ridicule. That young man finds it hard to be a Christian in the shop, or factory or store, when his comrades jeer at him because he will not go to the gambling-hell or other places of iniquity. Oh no, the days of persecution have not ceased, and will not until the end of the world. But, oh! you persecuted ones, is it not time that you began to pray for your persecutors? They are no prouder, no fiercer, no more set in their way than was this persecutor of the text. He fell. They will fall if Christ from the heavens grandly and gloriously look out on them. God can by his grace make a Renan believe in the divinity of Jesus, and a Tyndall in the worth of prayer. Robert Newton stamped the ship's deck in derisive indignation at Christianity only a little while before he became a Christian. "Out of my house," said a father to his daughter, "if you will keep praying;" yet before many months passed, the father knelt at the same altar with the child. And the Lord Jesus Christ is willing to look out from heaven upon that derisive opponent of the Christian religion, and address him not in glittering generalities, but calling him by name. "John! George! Henry!—Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me?"

Again, I learn from this subject that there is hope for the worst offenders. It was particularly outrageous that Saul should have gone to Damascus on that errand. Jesus Christ had been dead only three years, and the story of his kindness and his generosity and his love filled all the air. It was not an old story as it is now. It was a new story. Jesus had only three summers ago been in these very places, and Saul every day in Jerusalem must have met people who knew Christ, people with good eyesight whom Jesus had cured of blindness, people who were dead, and who had been resurrected by the Saviour, and people who could tell Paul all the particulars of the crucifixion—just how Jesus looked in the last hour—just how the heavens grew black in the face at the torture. He heard that recited every day by people who were acquainted with all the circumstances, and yet in the fresh memory of that scene he goes to persecute Christ's disciples, impatient at the time it takes to feed the horses at the inn, not pulling at the snaffle, but riding with loose rein faster and faster. Oh, he was the chief of sinners! No outbreak of modesty when he said that. He was a murderer. He stood by when Stephen died, and helped in the execution of that good man. When the rabble wanted to be unimpeded in their work of destroying Stephen, and wanted to take off their coats, but did not dare to lay them down lest they be stolen, Paul said, "I'll take care of the coats," and they put them down at the feet of Paul, and he watched the coats, and he watched the horrid mangling of glorious Stephen. Is it a wonder that when he fell from the horse he did not break his neck—that his foot did not catch somewhere in the trappings of the saddle, and he was not dragged and kicked to death? He deserved to die miserably, wretchedly, and forever, notwithstanding all his metaphysics, and his eloquence, and his logic. He was the chief of sinners. He said what was true when he said that. And yet the grace of God saved him, and so it will you. If there is any man in this house who thinks he is too bad to be saved, and says, "I have wandered very grievously from God, I do not believe there is any hope for me," I tell you the story of this man in the text who was brought to Jesus Christ in spite of his sins and opposition. There may be some here who are as stoutly opposed to Christ as Paul was. There may be some here who are captive of their sins as much so as the young man who said in regard to his dissipating habits, "I will keep on with them. I know I am breaking my mother's heart, and I know I am killing myself, and I know that when I die I shall go to hell, but it is now too late to stop."

The steed on which you ride may be swifter, and stronger, and higher-mettled than that on which the Cilician persecutor rode, but Christ can catch it by the bridle, and hurl it back and hurl it down. There is mercy for you who say you are too bad to be saved. You say you have put off the matter so long. Paul had neglected it a great while. You say that the sin you have committed has been amidst the most aggravating circumstances. That was so with Paul's. You say you have exasperated Christ and coaxed your own ruin. So did Paul. And yet he sits to-day on one of the highest of the heavenly thrones; and there is mercy for you, and good days for you, and gladness for you, if you will only take the same Christ which first threw him down and then raised him up. It seems to me as if I can see Paul to-day rising up from the highway to Damascus and brushing off the dust from his cloak and wiping the sweat of excitement from his brow, as he turns to us and all the ages, saying, "This a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

Once more: I learn from this subject that there is a tremendous reality in religion. If it had been a mere optical delusion on the road to Damascus, was not Paul just the man to find it out? If it had been a sham and pretense, would he not have pricked the bubble? He was a man of facts and arguments, of the most gigantic intellectual nature, and not a man of hallucinations. And when I see him fall from the saddle, blinded and overwhelmed, I say there must have been something it it. And, my dear brother, you will find that there is something in religion somewhere. The only question is, where?

There was a man who rode from Stamford to London, ninety-five miles in five hours, on horseback. Very swift. There was a woman of Newmarket who rode on horseback a thousand miles in a thousand hours. Very swift. But there are those here, ay, all of us are speeding on at tenfold that velocity, at a thousand-fold that rate, toward eternity. May Almighty God, from the opening heavens, flash upon your soul this hour the question of your eternal destiny, and oh that Jesus, would this hour overcome you with his pardoning mercy, as he stands here with the pathos of a broken heart and sobs into your ear, "I have come for thee. I come with my back raw from the beating. I come with my feet mangled with the nails. I come with my brow aching from the twisted bramble. I come with my heart bursting for your woes. I can stand it no longer. I am Jesus whom thou persecutest."

THE HOLIDAY HOME, BOGNOR, ENGLAND.

"A LITTLE WHILE."

"A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again a little while and ye shall see me." John 16: 17.

"A LITTLE while," the Master says,
"I needs must go away,
A little while; yes, many days,
Then comes the crowning day.

Have faith in God, believe in Me,
'A little while' at most,
Then where I am, there you shall be,
With the redeemed host.

Remember well my promised word,
Lest sin your hearts beguile,
While I your Brother, Friend and Lord
Be gone 'a little while.'"

"A little while" and sin no more
Shall o'er the earth prevail,
But everywhere, from shore to shore,
Brother will brother hail.

"A little while," o'er land and sea,
Will go the glad refrain,
Blessing, honor and power be
To him who once was slain.

"A little while," and oh! the joy
Of those whom Christ will own,
Of those who'll have the sweet employ
To stand before his throne.

ganizations are rapidly multiplying. Among them are nine Holiday Homes situated at Bognor, Folkstone, East Grinstead, Brenchley, Thursley, Caterham, Chislehurst, Bushey and Windsor. They are open for weak, pining little ones, found in any Ragged School, in need of a change to country or seaside to save their lives or restore their strength.

Over five thousand sick children are sent to the Holiday Homes every year, while fifteen thousand are taken for a briefer annual outing. Two of these Holiday Homes—that at Bognor and the "Rob Roy" Memorial Home at Ramsgate, are shown in the illustration accompanying this article. The Bognor Home, known as the "Arthur's Home," is one of the most commodious buildings ever erected in Great Britain for work of this character. A model of the Home was prepared at the request of Baroness Burdett-Coutts and sent to the Chicago Exposition. The "Rob Roy" Home was named in memory of the late Mr. John MacGregor, the founder of the Ragged School Shoeblack Brigades, and who was closely identified with the early history of the movement. The Ragged School moreover, has been the power that has originated a host of other noble philanthropies, including Homes for the Destitute, Rescue Homes and Retreats, Children's Missions and Institutes, etc. It is, in its own peculiar way, doing the work of a Young Men's Christian Association among the youth of the lowest station in Great Britain, and it acts as a bond of union for all worthy enterprises of the kind, not only in London but throughout the British dominions, including Canada. What the American Sunday School Union has accomplished among the poor children in hundreds of obscure localities in the United States, the Ragged School Union has done among the destitute and drifting juvenile population of the great cities of Her Majesty's dominions. Among its patrons are Queen Victoria, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Selborne, Lord Reay, late Governor of Bombay, the Duchess of Teck, Lady Jeune, the late Earl Cairns, the Duke of Sussex, and many others of position and influence. Not the least interesting item of the work of a single department of the Union—the London Needlework Guild—is the fact that in a single year forty-two thousand garments were made and distributed by this Guild, of which the Duchess of Teck is President. The Needlework Guild was started by Lady Diana Wolverton, an estimable Christian gentlewoman. The four great funds of the Ragged School Union: the General Fund, the Holiday Homes Fund, Shaftesbury Fund and Benevolent Fund are generously supported by the rich and titled class as well as by the leaders in the great business world of England, and the entire resources of the Union are derived from voluntary contributions from all classes alike. The administration of the Union's revenues as well as its general affairs has for a number of years past been skilfully conducted by Mr. John Kirk, the General Secretary, whose headquarters are at Exeter Hall, London. Mr. Kirk's portrait appears on the first page. On the same page is an illustration representing a typical group of "drift-children" rescued from the slums and alleys of London and now under training in one of the many Homes of the Ragged School Union. These girls, most of them orphans and homeless, are examples of the many thousands of arabs of the streets who have been saved from vicious and wretched lives, trained in habits of intelligent industry and led to become useful Christian women through the instrumentality of the Ragged School Union, just as thousands have been saved and transformed through the efforts of the Five Points Mission in New York and kindred institutions in different American cities.

The industrial work of the Union has opened up a wide field of usefulness. The week night schools number 57, giving an average attendance of 2,475 scholars in attendance and 4,241 on the books. The ordinary week night school has given place in measure to industrial work, the gymnasium, the singing class, or the club, and the numbers are more than compensated for by the Industrial Classes which are reported in 116 schools with 4,756 members. The forms of industry are varied and include carpentering, cooking, sewing, boot mending, wood chopping, basket making, flower making, cutting out and dress making, fretwork, etc.

John Pounds builded better than he knew. Within half a century after the old Portsmouth cobbler began his efforts in his workshop among the poor boys of his neighborhood, the seed he planted has borne fruit a hundred thousand-fold all over England.

HIS WANT AND HIS NEED.

In a recent sermon by Rev. T. M. Morris, President of the Baptist Union, he said that some years ago, there was a young man in the town where he then had a charge who was leading an exceedingly wild, dissolute life; but instead of finding pleasure in it, his conscience so troubled him that he became wretched and miserable, until at last he determined to end his life by throwing himself in the river. One Sunday he was on his way to carry out his resolution but thought he would go to church once more to hear something that would prepare him for the great change of worlds. Mr. Morris's church was the first he came to and he went in. Mr. Morris was preaching on Jonah, and almost the first remark this man heard on entering was that God could raise man from the lowest depths. The words struck him as most applicable to his case, and when he left the meeting, instead of going to the river as he had intended, he went home. The next morning he called on Mr. Morris and told his story, asking him if God could raise him from the depths to which he had fallen. He was assured that he could, and after some conversation he left, professing to take Christ as his Saviour, and his after life showed that it was no empty profession, for Mr. Morris knew him as an earnest, active Christian till the time of his death.

"HIS LIFE IS HIS MONUMENT."

Such is the epitaph on the Quincy granite monument recently erected in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., over the grave of him familiarly known as Uncle John Vassar. It is fifteen years since the great soul-winner exchanged his loved employment upon the earth for his crown in heaven. It is believed few men have ever lived and labored for the souls of men whose crown will be found more thickly studded with stars. Many who read the announcement of the completion of a monument to his memory will feel that nothing more appropriate could be placed upon the stone. Both for him and for others there can be no higher praise. To be influential in leading thousands upon thousands to Jesus Christ—can there be a loftier ambition? "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." Daniel 12:3.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS.

S.S. Lesson for Dec. 24. Matt. 2: 1-11. Golden Text, Matt. 1: 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

MEN are speculating now about the second coming of our Lord as in the days of Herod, the King of Judea, they speculated about his first coming. There was then plenty of book knowledge on the subject; the scribes and the chief priests were well up in the doctrine, but it was not a personal matter with them, they did not make room in their life for him of whom they read, and about whose coming they spoke as of something afar off and outside of themselves. They were proud of, and content with their knowledge and a reputation for piety and learning from their fellow men; certificates of honor and merit from the colleges of learning where they had graduated, were sufficient to win for them the position in the world which they coveted; and as to the future, they left it, as men do now, in a vague uncertainty.

What then must have been the astonishment of these self-satisfied theologians when suddenly there broke into their midst men as wise, or wiser than they, who had travelled immense distances with in view, to find, and see for themselves him about whom his professed worshippers were so indifferent! Men, perhaps from different countries, but with the same distinct, imperative inquiry: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him." They were sure of their affair; they did not ask: "Is he born?" They knew it already by divine revelation. While learned men of Jerusalem had discussed the doctrine, the wise men from the east had come to headquarters, and listened to their God; and with all the certainty which cannot admit of a doubt, they, Gentiles, come to the metropolis of Judea, and say: "Your expected King is born: where is he? From heaven itself we have been directed to your city: 'we have seen his star in the east' and we are come to do him homage: where is he that we may worship him?"

Nothing disconcerts unspiritual men so much as reality in others. They can stand any amount of argument, they can be at home in disputation: talking and working they can understand, eloquence and devotedness, anything which distinguishes man. But real contact with the living God angers them. An awakened soul is in their eyes either a fool or a hypocrite. No "star" of heaven has arisen on their horizon: they are "of the earth, earthy." They have no need of God's light from heaven. Their own experience, the opinions of other men, the books which they have studied about God, make up the sum of religion to them. But God himself is as yet, unknown to them.

The result of the startling question of the Magi was that "Herod the king was troubled and all Jerusalem with him." A calamity had befallen them, something out of the ordinary! It was what they had not sought, nor planned, nor desired, and it put them out of their way. It was foretold by God's word; holy men of old had sought and searched diligently in the Scriptures about it; those who were reckoned among the pious by the generality were looking for it; but to the Jews in general it was a calamity, and to a worldly set meaning that God had come nigh unto them! It is so to-day. Of all things men of the world dread to have God brought nigh unto them. They love to worship Him as long as he is the God of heaven and has his dwelling beyond the stars. But they don't want to have him long on earth interfering with their ways, pondering their life, investigating, restraining, judging, bringing things to light. Men would rather do without God if they could, they want to be their own masters, and to be a law to themselves, instead of obeying the law of God.

If it was an unexpected interruption in the life of Jerusalem when the wise men came into the city with their irrepressible inquiry after the new-born King, and if astonishment seized upon the people—surely the astonishment of the wise men must have been greater still when they found the very reigning King of Judea to be ignorant of the existence of him whom they came to seek. What, could a matter of such intense importance to them be a matter of indifference to the very people among whom He came? Could the birth of the Messiah which had been announced from heaven itself to them be unknown and disregarded by the Jews themselves?

Herod called together the theologians (chief priests and scribes) and inquired of them where the Christ should be born (R.V.)

They Knew the Letter of the Word, and where to look for the information; and they produced the prophecy of Micah 5: 2 to prove that Jesus should be born in Bethlehem. Oh how Bible knowledge condemns when it is not lived out! If the chief priests and scribes had not known where Christ should be born, if the wise men had never come with their stirring question, the leaders of Jewish thought would not have been so guilty. Their sin was of the same nature as that to which the Lord refers when he says: "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin, but they have no excuse for their sin." (John 15: 22.) They saw the king call the wise men to a private conference, they witnessed their departure to seek the Messiah, they saw how earnest they were and yet themselves sought him not! They had no room in their lives for Jesus; the very fact that the tidings of his advent were a trouble and not a joy to them, spoke for itself that they did not want him. The Son of God was in their eyes an unwelcome intruder; "He came unto his own and his own received him not." (John 1: 11.) What a revelation of utter hollowness and unreality! The only reason for the existence of priests and scribes was to keep up the intercourse between God and man, and yet when God came near to them and fulfilled the very scriptures which they taught, there was nothing in his coming to attract them; they were more at home with the unbelieving and ungodly Herod, no wonder the next generation chose Barrabas before him!

Christ is Coming Again.

Oh, the unrest, the terror which his coming would inspire if he should come to-day! What about the haunts of speculators? What about the gambling dens? What about the awful immorality, the levity and frivolity of multitudes among the unsaved? What about the false professors in the churches? Would Christ's coming be to them sudden destruction, (1. Thes. 5: 3), or sudden glory? Would it not be looked upon as a terrible calamity, were he to come again to-day? Would it not be, as at his first coming, the exception, and not the rule, that his coming inspired joy? The Daystar has indeed arisen in the hearts of some (II. Pet. 1: 19), but oh how few! Some there are who have all in their lives in readiness for his return, some there are whose citizenship is in heaven from whence they look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ. Like the wise men and the shepherds of old, they have taken pains to find him in his own Word and in his own Person. He is no Stranger to them, they have seen his Star, it has brought heaven's morning into their lives; they are transformed; they are children of the coming day and all they do and say bears upon the coming of their Lord.

The wise men left the presence of the king and found again a surer Guide; God did not abandon them to Herod. They had faithfully borne their testimony before the king, they had passed unhurt through the severe test of the atmosphere of indifference in Jerusalem; and now the star reappeared, and they were at home with light from heaven. "When they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." Oh, the relief it is to get out of an earthly atmosphere into a heavenly! Let us remember our missionary brethren who must breathe, day by day, the heavy air of idolatry and sin! The guidance of the wise men now was sure, and now nothing stumbled them. The lowly circumstances of Mary, the stable where the young child lay—no form nor comeliness, no beauty that they should desire him—all this was no hindrance to their faith: they were under the leading of light from heaven, they walked by faith, and they knew they were not deceived.

LESSON POINTS.

MODERN BETHLEHEM.

EACH of the four biographies of Christ has its special characteristics and its distinct purpose. Matthew presents him as the King of the Jews, the Messiah predicted by the prophets. He shows that he was hailed as a King at his birth and at his death. The visit of the wise men described in the lesson was a tribute to his royalty. We are not informe din the New Testament who they were, nor how many there were of them, nor whence they came. There are many traditions about them, but they are worthless. It may, however, be inferred that they came either from Persia or Chaldœa, where the magi formed a separate class. Probably, too, they were astronomers, as men who knew nothing of the science would not be likely to detect a new star, or a meteor, as it doubtless was. The central thought of the lesson is of the seekers after Christ being divinely led. They followed the heavenly light and were guided to him. Herod and the scribes had more exact and specific information, but they were not seeking Christ to worship him and they did not find him. It has been so ever since. Mere knowledge does not bring anyone to Christ; there must be a desire to worship him and own him as the King. Also, Christ is still a test of character, as he was then. When he is near, either by his Spirit, or in his people, the wise rejoice, but bad men are troubled. Another point is that the wise men recognized him in spite of his unkingly surroundings and worshipped him and offered gifts. Christ still appreciates such homage. He has not taken to himself his power to reign, but those who recognize him as their King now and voluntarily serve him, obey him and honor him will be specially honored by him in the day of his glory.

When Jesus was born. It is important to remember that Jesus lived before this time. He came to this earth and was born a little child that he might save the world. It is related of the Moravians that when they heard of the horrors of West Indian slavery and of the misery of the slaves who had not the hope of heaven to cheer them in their suffering, that they resolved on a heroic self-sacrifice. Two of them gave up their liberty and went to a West Indian plantation and became slaves that they might tell the slaves of Christ and how they might become free in him. There was no other way of preaching the Gospel to them and the two Moravian heroes gave their liberty and submitted to cruelty and hardship that the other slaves might hear the good news. So Christ gave up heaven where he was loved and worshipped and became a child that the world might be saved.

Who is he? Dr. J. M. Reid relates that some years ago four Indians of the Flathead tribe, living on the Pacific coast, crossed the Rocky Mountains, and traversing three thousand miles of intervening wilderness appeared at St. Louis. They had been sent by their nation to inquire about the white man's God and the book that revealed him, of both of which they had heard from a trapper and hunter who had witnessed some of their pagan rites and told them that they were wrong in their worship, and that far to the East the white man had a book that revealed the true God. Two of the Indians, worn out with the long journey, died in St. Louis. The zeal of these Indians aroused so much interest that a mission was at once organized to send the Gospel beyond the Rocky Mountains.

We saw his star . . . and are come to worship him. Many others may have seen the star, but only the wise came to worship. Probably their friends thought them foolish in leaving their homes for such a purpose on such slight intimation. It is so now. Many hear the Gospel but few seek its blessings for themselves. Before Columbus set out to seek the New World people had often wondered where the strange woods and fruits came from that drifted occasionally from the West and some thought there might be land there. Columbus was the one to test the suspicion by practical experiment. In arguing with an infidel, Mr. Guthrie once used this heroic voyage as an illustration. He said, "Columbus was ridiculed as we Christians are, but we have grounds for our faith as he had. His countrymen ridiculed him as you do us. They thought him mad to leave his land and his pleasant home to launch on a sea which keel had never ploughed, in search of a land man had never seen. But he launched his bark on the deep, and with strange stars above him, strange seas around him, storms without and mutinies within, no man of all the crew hoping but himself, with a courage nothing could daunt, and a perseverance nothing could exhaust, that remarkable man stood by the helm, and kept the prow of his bark onward and westward till lights gleamed on San Salvador's shore, and as the day broke, the joyful cry, 'Land,' rang from the mast-head, and faith was crowned with success, and patience had her perfect work."

When they were come into the house, they saw the child. The house was but a barn and the mother and babe were among cattle. We often wonder why some one in the inn did not make room for them under the circumstances. It is still more wonderful that when Christ knocks at the door of the heart for admission it is so often closed against him as the doors of homes and inns were closed against him at his birth. The reason is that people will not incommode themselves by receiving him. One day, writes Cicero in his treatise on old age, an aged Athenian, came into the forum, but not one of his fellow citizens in that immense crowd would incommode himself to make room for him. As, however, he approached the ambassadors from Lacedæmon, who had their own special seat, they all rose to receive him into their midst. The whole assembly burst into applause, whereupon somebody said, "The Athenians know what is good, but they will not practice it."

A German author relates that a wealthy nobleman, while out hunting, was lost in a swamp. Covered with mud, he appealed for help at one cottage after another, but at each was repulsed. At length one poor widow took him into her humble home and cared for him. A few days afterwards a court-carriage stopped at her door, and the man she had befriended, alighted. He came to give her a prettily furnished cottage and money enough to last during her lifetime. When he asked her how she came to welcome him when all the others refused, she said: "I thought of him, who, for my sake, had not where to lay his head; for his sake I opened my door." Christ will reward those who confess him now.

Opened their treasures and offered him gifts. The gift Christ most desires of any one is their heart. "Son," he says, "give me thine heart." That is to say he desires the best love of every one of his followers. Too often the heart is on the world or on pleasure or money, instead of being given to Christ. A famous Italian painter has illustrated the fact in a picture which hangs in one of the art galleries of Rome. It represents a sick man stretched on his bed, and his physicians come to visit him. They have examined their patient, and ascertained his malady to be that his heart is gone—it has already disappeared. From a pulpit nearby, St. Anthony of Padua, is preaching on the text, "For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." He announces where the sick man's heart will be found; and the clue he furnishes is followed up in another compartment of the picture by a group of the sick man's friends, who open his strong box, and stand amazed at discovering the missing organ reposing among the gold pieces. It is as true as though it were a literal fact, that the heart may be enticed from its rightful place to lie among earthly treasures.

Familiar Talks From Afar.

The Dominant Sex—How Woman Rules in Society, Business and Home Life in England and On the Continent.

BEGUILED by the warmth and cheer of the reading room of my cosy and surprisingly home-like hotel, I have brought my paper and pen to a table near the window. The rain falls without in fitful showers, but the respite from sight-seeing is welcome. Fogs and storms so generally prevail in "Sunny France" from the middle of October to the latter part of January, that we have considered ourselves peculiarly favored by the fine, clear weather of the past fortnight. The wet day has kept others in-doors beside myself. A group of English-speaking travelers are chatting in subdued, well-bred tones on the other side of the room; three are English, and at least one is an American, I presently decide, and by the time I have written six lines, the half-ear that is lent to them—in spite of my determination to think of nothing except the unseen audience I am holding converse with—takes in the tenor of the discussion.

"American women are in the lead in all benevolent and educational enterprises," remarks an Englishwoman politely. "Their independence of thought and action used to startle us. Now it merely surprises those who have not kept pace with the growth of your great country. You do everything upon a gigantic scale, and seem to be satisfied with nothing you have done. In the matter of feminine influence, you are especially daring. Where will you stop?"

"Not until they have reduced husbands, fathers and sons to the position of serfs!" strikes in bass tones, lighter, by the way, than those of the average American man. This peculiarity impresses every traveler from our "gigantic" land. The Irish voice, as is well known, is inferior in quality and resonance to the American, but one expects rotund, sonorous tones from John Bull. We have learned to recognize the full chest-notes and free delivery of each word that characterizes the speech of our educated countrymen, and to listen for it when many are talking, with pride and pleasure. The Frenchman chatters. There is an odd effect of clashing syllables in his rapid articulation. The Englishman pitches his voice too high and does not open his mouth fully.

We have quietly received the strictures of foreigners upon our nasal drawl until we have overlooked the truth that our best classes speak purer English and more agreeably than the English themselves.

But to this particular specimen who shares the habit of his countrymen of commenting freely upon the manners and customs of America, or "the States,"—as they persist in calling it—without fear of wounding citizens of that country, or favor to those of the gentler sex whom they may be addressing.

"The attitude of American women of this day and generation is subversive of the natural and divine order of things," he continues. "They dominate men in all ranks of society; they are pushing them aside in business walks; in the pulpit; at the bar; as medical practitioners, as editors and authors. I cannot but regard this aspect of national, social, and domestic affairs with serious concern."

"Yet American husbands have an international reputation as the best in the world," says the polite Englishwoman, whose remark provoked the free expression of British sentiment.

"Because they are dragooned into good behavior!" is the blunt response. "They are dominated by their wives, until they have grown obsequiously obedient—actually almost servile."

The fifth member of the party, all of whom are strangers to me, speaks now for the first time. Her voice is well modulated, her words are aptly chosen; her accent, and manner of lengthening out certain vowels betray her nationality. As she speaks, her face flushes slightly, but her tone is civil.

"That would or might imply that American men are deficient in spirit, that, as a class they are not courageous?"

The white-haired English squire (for such I take him to be), bows slightly.

"The inference is yours, madam, not mine."

It is however natural, is it not?"

"I should not have asserted it, but since you ask, I cannot deny it."

"Yet," speaking very slowly, and not looking at him, but as one who is making up her own mind—"the history of nations furnishes us with at least two instances when their bravery was adequate to the occasion."

The dead silence following the home-thrust is broken at last, by the remark from one of the party that the "weather is more like London than Paris."

I have had my quiet laugh out to myself, and recalled all my senses to the consideration of a subject brought forcibly to me by this international episode.

As in the matter of voices and manner of speaking referred to just now, we have let pass slurs upon our national characteristics, in ignorance, indifference, or modesty, until they are accepted as the statement of established truths. The assumption of the aggressive disposition of the American woman and the prominence she claims in business life, as in the management of home and husband, is a fallacy we have been strangely backward in contradicting. We have made so much noise over the enlargement of our sphere, and entered so triumphantly the new avenues opened to our feet, that we have overlooked the fact of the occupation of these to a yet larger extent by our sisters on this side of the salt-sea waves.

For one woman who keeps a shop in the United States, there are forty women shopkeepers in England. For every hotel and tavern landlady over there, one hundred stand behind bars and bully guests, and make out bills with unmasculine regard to "extras," in the great little island of Britain. While in England we made a specialty of old-fashioned hostelries, such as Dickens writes of, and Scott has made classic. We slept at Black Bulls, and lunched at White Lions and dined at Red Horses, and were charged within a quarter-inch of our lives at the far-famed Warwick Arms, wherein, as we were told the "H'Earl of Leicester's men" used to drink and gamble, in proof whereof the "hotel" sports the Warwick coat-of-arms to this day. In every instance it was a woman who made a bargain with us (and invariably got the best of us), who drew up and recited our bills, and ordered obsequious waiters to the right and left, with good-natured arrogance, or viragoish sharpness. At Butt's Hotel in London, an old, highly-respectable and expensive family-resort, we were welcomed by a smiling housekeeper in black silk and tulle, who was the only responsible manager with whom we dealt.

At Drury Lane and the Globe theatres—perhaps at others—there are, I am told, none but women-ushers, who seat audiences and thrust in business-like style programmes upon every new arrival, demanding (and getting) six-pence for each. In a majority of churches in town and country, women are "pew-openers"—or, as we would name them, ushers. These last-mentioned officials bear a surprising resemblance to one another, all wearing mourning garments—more or less rusty—and many what Dickens has taught us to recognize as "mortified black bonnets." To a non-aggressive traveler from the New World, the situation was not without a dash of the comic, when a distinguished preacher checked himself in the reading of the first hymn of the service, at a tap upon his gowned shoulder from the prim, bonneted functionary who tripped up the pulpit-stairs to bring him a "notice." At many railway-stations, you buy your ticket from women; postage-stamps and postal orders are as often dealt out by a woman as a man, and in haberdashery, millinery, china, shoe and boot shops as many girl clerks are employed as young men. A woman shows you Shakespeare's birth-place, and an old woman takes you over Anne Hathaway's cottage; the porter's wife unlocks for you the door of the "Jerusalem chamber" in Westminster Abbey, and tells you that Henry IV. died there; that there the Bible was first translated into English and there sat the immortal Assembly that drafted the shorter Catechism. Women keep lodge and turnpike-gates, and a woman holds the keys of State, and sits in the seat of Edward the Confessor and Richard Cœur de Lion.

Across the Channel where the Salic Law forbids any woman to become reigning sovereign, she is, if possible, more dominant in every other sphere than even in England. It is Madame who rules house, shop, hotel, market and salon, without a pretense of subordination to any lord and master. Hotel-clerks are often women, and the typewriter so nearly invariably that the exception is notable, if he be a man. The ruling spirit of wine-shop and eating house is not the man whose name may appear upon the sign above the door, but the blackeyed, sometimes smiling, sometimes austere matron, who conducts sales, directs attendants and deals, after her fashion, with complainants. Should Monsieur be gathered prematurely to his fathers, Madame conducts the business at the old stand, and sometimes advertises the fact upon the tomb-stones.

Going further into the heart of the continent, you find women acting as hotel-porters, and I once saw at Strasbourg a just wedded couple on their way to their new home, the bride carrying her trunk upon a pair of stalwart shoulders, while the groom bore the bridal bouquet.

So far from leading her sex in a war of independence against man as a tyrant, bent stubbornly upon maintaining a distinct individual existence, the American woman of moderate means is better cared-for, protected and cherished than her sisters in any other country that the sun shines on.

We sail to-morrow from Marseilles for the East, where within a fortnight I hope to take up in successive "talks," the story of what domestic life is in Palestine in this, our day, as seen by the eyes of a woman from the fresher—now the happier world—where all that pertains to the Holy Land is invested with devout interest. When my feet tread the hills that knew the pleasure of our Lord's infancy in childhood, in youth, and during the brief ministry of the Man of Sorrows to a dying race, I shall in spirit have with me the many who will, in turn, bear an eager part in my journeyings and researches.

CHRISTIANIZED INDIANS OF OREGON.

OREGON INDIAN CONVERTS.

ONE of the most thrilling chapters o missionary experience in Northf America is that which relates to the efforts to spread the Gospel among the Indians of Oregon. From 1835 to 1847 there were thirteen missionaries sent by the American Board to labor among these people, and considerable progress had been made among them when suddenly a hostile feeling was developed, culminating in the massacre of 1847, which compelled the discontinuance of all missionary effort in that quarter for a time. But the seed planted had taken root, and when the opportunity came, other workers went to the field and again the Gospel message was scattered amoug the Indians of Oregon. The various Protestant missionary organizations, the American Sunday School Union, and such civilizing and Christianizing agencies as the Carlisle Indian School and the Hampton Institute of Hampton, Va., have each contributed in their various ways toward evangelizing the Indians, but for many years the Oregons have been a practically neglected people. In the public documents of the Hampton Institute a number of interesting cases of the effect of spiritual and intellectual training on the Indians are recorded, Cherokees, Arickarees, Sioux, Mandans, Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Gros Ventses, Crows being among the tribes mentioned, but strangely enough the Oregon Indians are practically unrepresented in the training schools and institutes.

There is a brighter day at hand for this neglected people, and it is expected that the missionary work among them, which has lain so long idle, will now be carried forward energetically to the saving of many souls.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion

CHEER UP.

LET us bless God that we were born where we were born and live now. I would not have lived in any other country if I had the choice. This is the greatest of all times to live in. The world is tuning its strings for the great orchestra which shall celebrate the coming in of brighter eras. You cannot make me believe that so many new churches and so many new universities and so many new Christian printing presses and so many thousands of good men and women, enlisted body, mind and soul for God and the world's salvation, are going to end in a miserable Bull Run defeat, with scattered canteens and torn knapsacks and disgraced banners and unwheeled ammunition wagons. If God be for us, who can be against us? In his name long ago we set up our banners, and we propose to keep them floating until the world is won for Christ and there be nothing to despoil or hurt in all God's holy mount. Do you not notice the world is getting ready for some great event? Has it not struck you, in reading the history of the last ten years, that the world is getting ready for some great event? Before Christ's first coming the nations were in expectancy. There were signs in the sky and movements in the earth and crises among nations, which gave premonition. So now among the thoughtful people there is a looking for the arrival of some stupendous event. There is not a nation of Europe or Asia that is not looking for some great change. Earthquakes all around the planet. God said that the greatest events of his Kingdom would be ushered in with earthquake, and he says again and again, "There will be a great earthquake." Hurricanes and deluges and geographical transformations in all parts of the world. It would be just like God to step out from this swaying and shivering scenery of events to offer some new deliverance, to pronounce some new benediction, to set up some new throne of righteousness. Within a few years, a new world has appeared in the constellation of the Swan. Astronomers had never seen it before. The fact was it was created probably within a few years. I do not suppose that God wore out his creative hand when he made this world. I suppose God is as strong now as he ever was, and if he could make that new world, I think he can make a new heaven and a new earth in which dwelleth righteousness. He declared he would make all things new, and he is able to keep his promise. Appreciation of the brilliant peroration of the world's history is the secret of cheerful Christian work. Show [illegible] ruin, and I will show you a man absolutely useless, either for church or state. You see men and women toiling amid all opposition and all discouraging circumstances, yet with smiling face and illumined countenance. How do they keep up? they know it is only a question of time when the right will conquer. They know they are only in a party of skirmishers sent out in advance of the great armies that are after a while to move in solid brigade under the Lord of Hosts. What if the skirmishers are now and then driven back? They only return to headquarters and soon start again for the front. All the armies of Xerxes and Baldwin the First and Napoleon and Grant and Lee would not be a corporal's guard compared with the armies of the church militant when they get orders to march for the last campaign. Enough for us the honor of being under Christ, our Captain. Though our post be humble and we have only to swab a gun or play a fife or shoe a cavalry horse, or hold a stirrup while some colonel mounts, let us do our work with faithful hands and cheerful heart; and though many of the epauletted and bestarred of the service may not appreciate us, I am sure the General will recognize us as he rides along the victorious line at the last and waves his sword towards us, crying, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the Tree of Life which is in the midst of the paradise of God." In that day we will be breveted.

MONDAY NEWSPAPERS.

WE rejoice at the enlarged space which the secular journals of this country are giving to religious discussions, and by the publication of extracts of sermons on Monday are becoming the heralds of the Gospel. I notice also that some clergymen have severely criticised this sermonic reporting. They say that the Monday synopsis of their discourses does them injustice, that the pastors are represented as saying things they never said, that isolated sentences are taken out of their connection, and that, upon the whole, sermonic reporting in secular journals is damaging to the pulpit and Christianity. So far from being the cause of complaint, it ought to be a matter of thanksgiving to God that in this country the secular press has become the means of Gospel proclamation. In England all this work is left to the religious weeklies. The London Times and the lesser lights rarely make mention of sermon or Christian exhortation. Suppose all the sermons reported in our secular presses were dull and useless, the text would be there, and who can tell what the publication of twenty Scripture texts per week among the millions accosted by the American printing press might do for the World's evangelization? Ministers must not be nervous about mistakes in reportorial accounts. There is no perfection in this world, not even in the pulpit.

The general rule is that if a sermon have anything useful about it, the community comes to get that fact, though the phraseology in print may be a little twisted. The simple fact is, that some people do not understand the work of reporters. Their critics do not realize that the men who write in front of the pulpit have their mission as certainly as the man who stands in the pulpit. A pastor ought not to say anything on Sabbath that he would be ashamed to see in print the next morning. If the Gospel preached is not fit for the fifty thousand readers, then it is not fit for the five hundred auditors.

LIVE WITHIN YOUR MEANS.

AMONG the multitudes of resolutions to be formed for the new year there is no better one than a resolve to pay as you go. It seems passing strange that the payments of debts should be inculcated upon professing Christians, and yet is there any evil habit to which Christian men are more addicted than that of incurring debt which they cannot discharge at maturity? And the causes of this condition of things are many and multiform. Sometimes it is the result of a weak desire to live in a style beyond one's means. Oftentimes it is the result of thoughtlessness, or a general unwillingness to systematize one's expenditures. Often it proceeds from a free-heartedness and a desire to do for others, especially for the family, more than one's circumstances admit; and not infrequently it is owing to a spirit of extravagance which is a legitimate inheritance from father to son. But whatever the cause may be, as a general rule debt can be avoided and much happiness saved. To do this, above all firmly resolve to live within your means, however limited they may be; make no promises which you have not a reasonable certainty of keeping; be firm in applying whatever money you may have on hand to the liquidation of some debt in whole or in part, and above all, avoid, so far as possible, contracting a future obligation wherewith to pay a present one. And in your purchases: when you want that for which you cannot pay at the time, wait till you can before procuring it, and when you do get it, you will enjoy it all the more for the sacrifice which it has cost. There is a true nobility in denying yourself that which you cannot afford, which will increase your own self-respect, and raise you in the estimation of your friends.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. C. Cheers, Murfreesboro, Tenn. How were people saved before the coming of Christ?

By obedience and faith in the appointed sacrifices as typifying the sacrifice of the Great Deliverer who was to come. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews shows how faith was exercised by many illustrious saints.

Mrs. H. E. Nelson, San Francisco. Many would like to know what Scriptural authority Dr. Talmage has for his statement that the man does not live who does not commit sin.

There are many statements in the Bible which support the statement. The most direct is that in 1. John 1: 8. "If we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us."

J. P. Benson, Plainfield, N. J. What was the early or original religion of Egypt?

The primitive religion of Egypt was undoubtedly ancestor worship, which gradually developed into a more comprehensive form. The oldest form of prayer extant which is dated about 3766 B.C., shows that the Egyptians prayed to Anubis or Osiris. The belief in a supreme deity, over all other gods, was characteristic of their religion from the first.

S. D. Davis, Vienna, S. C. 1. Did the Apostle Paul die a natural death? 2. When Peter on the Day of Pentecost told his hearers to be baptized for the remission of sins, did he mean that their sins would be removed by baptism?

1. The tradition is that he was beheaded and it is probably true. He would escape crucifixion by his Roman citizenship. 2. Baptism at that time was an act so momentous, as publicly connecting a man with the proscribed church, that it implied the existence of saving faith. Peter called upon them to thus publicly confess Christ.

Reader, Gainsville, Mo. Is a Christian in a fit condition to take the Sacrament if he is avoiding the company of former friends, who have done him injury, but is not talking against them, nor wishing them harm?

If he has forgiven the injury, has no malice in his heart and has taken care that his former friends know of his attitude toward them, there is no reason why he should not go to the Lord's Table with a clear conscience. He is not required to restore the former intimate relations if they have become uncongenial.

Sister in Christ, Clay Lake, O. 1. Where is the Garden of Eden? 2. Why did Christ refuse (Matt. 8: 22) to allow the man to bury his father? 3. Do you understand II Peter 3. 10-13 to teach that the world will be burned?

1. No one knows. Various theories have been advanced, but none worthy of credence. 2. The funerals of those days were ceremonies which one setting out on the Christian life as a disciple of Christ could not attend without detriment. 3. Peter's expression about a new earth in the thirteenth verse might mean that the earth would be purified by fire rather than absolutely destroyed.

X. Y. Z., California. 1. Please explain why the Evangelical churches object to a simple game of cards, any more than dominoes, chess and other similar games. We mean, of course, where such games are simply played for amusement, without betting or other objectionable accompaniments. 2. Why is it considered wrong for professors of religion to attend a theatre to see a strictly moral play, whom it is not considered wrong to have one of Shakespeare's plays read by some noted elocutionist? 3. Do you think it right to have dancing where only invited or a select set of friends meet?

The same answer will apply to all three inquiries. Card-playing, theatre-going and dancing are condemned not because they are in themselves necessarily sinful, but for the reason that they open the sluice-gates to a flood of temptations and sinful indulgences. Their associations, even in the least objectionable form, are opposed to spiritual growth and progress. No one has ever been helped in the Christian life by these amusements, but, on the other hand, thousands upon thousands who have trodden the downward path date their first mis-step on the day they first indulged in card-playing, dancing or theatre-going. Apart from all other considerations, and even though we ourselves may be proof against the allurements of such dissipations, regard for the moral welfare of others and especially of the young, should make to avoid giving an example that might lead them into sin.

Subscriber, Washington, D. C. 1. Is it true that the Roman Catholic Church has original manuscripts of any of the books of the Old or New Testament? 2. Is the Apocrypha inspired?

1. It is not true. The Romish Church does not make any such claim. The oldest copy it possesses is the one in the library of the Vatican, which appears to have been written about the year 300 A.D. Certainly not earlier. The original writings would probably crumble into dust in a century if, as is likely, they were written on sheets of papyrus. Fac-similes of the Vatican Bible are in many libraries. 2. From the sixteenth century to the present time, Protestant scholars have been unanimous in regarding it as uninspired.

O. B. Gates, Forest Grove, Ore. Why do Baptists refuse to admit Christians who have been baptized by sprinkling to the Lord's Table? Do they regard them as unsaved?

Possibly some Baptists may so regard them. The majority, however, do not. They look upon them as Christians who are not literally obeying the divine command and refuse fellowship with them on that ground. Other denominations contend that sprinkling is Scriptural baptism and that infant baptism is an act of dedication.

Charles Abbott, McKeesport, Pa. 1. The Constitution does not acknowledge the supremacy of God. Is it right for a church member to become a citizen and vote? Can he rightly swear allegiance to that which does not acknowledge Christ? 2. Is it a sin to change our views in church matters and leave to join another church, or are we supposed to adhere to our first views and consider our first obligations taken in joining the church?

1. It is part of a Christian's duty to conform to the laws of the land except where they conflict with his duty toward his Maker. As the Constitution is the highest law of the land and guarantees religious liberty, he ought to live according to its principles and share its full privileges, including the right of suffrage, the proper exercise of which enables him to work for God and morality by upholding pure government and securing the enactment of just and righteous laws. Hence we believe that citizenship is compatible with the Christian profession. 2. No; the change may be a result of temperament or preference. If a person after due consideration, concludes that his horizon of spiritual usefulness will be enlarged by changing his church allegiance, he has a perfect right to do so. Although the essentials may be identical in Christian churches, there is a wide difference in working methods and the individual must choose those best suited to his needs.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE SPANISH FORT IN AFRICA.

SPAIN has at length taken measures adequate to the task of defending the beleagured garrison at Mellila. The reinforcements which have been sent out are deemed sufficient to cope with any force that the Riff tribes can send against the place. The Riffians did not wait for their arrival, but retreated with all haste to their mountain fastnesses whither it would be dangerous for the Spaniards to follow them. The small fort and town are now crowded to a degree dangerous to the health of the soldiers and people. The fortress does not cover more than fifteen acres. Its walls are strongly built and rise to a height of sixty and in some parts a hundred feet above the sea. The picture on this page of a corner in the fortifications shows the character of the citadel and the surrounding country. It is built on the mediæval model with portcullis, subterranean passages, dark casements and dungeons cut in the solid rock. Behind the walls is the town of Mellila, a dull, gloomy collection of houses, with streets so narrow that a panier-laden donkey can scarcely pass through them. The Spaniards have built an outer wall to protect the town, enclosing an area of about twenty acres, and beyond this are six detached forts of the circular pattern, on which are mounted the guns of longest range. It would appear that the citadel must be impregnable to the Riffians, although a bombardment by heavy artillery would quickly reduce it. It seems probable that no attack will be made by the tribes while the garrison is as large as at present, but the Riffians will wait only until the fresh troops are withdrawn before renewing their hostilities. By some means of communication unknown to the Spaniards, the enemy is kept informed of the state of affairs within the fortress and can thus choose the most favorable time for an attack. The price of Spanish possession will therefore be the maintenance of a strong garrison and the most constant vigilance. It is a trying position with foes on all sides and traitors within. Such a position the Christian occupies throughout his life in the world. His adversary is strong and watchful and ever ready to take him off his guard. He can never afford to neglect the Apostolic injunction, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith—quit you, like men—be strong." (1. Cor. 16: 13.)

INSIDE THE SPANISH FORTIFICATIONS AT MELLILA.

Did not Want Advice.

A young man of wealth and position passed a night in a station-house, recently, as the result of his own persistence. For some months past the New York police have been awrre that a resort of vicious character existed in Twenty-sixth street. It was kept by a man who formerly conducted a similar resort down-town which had been raided and closed. He waa more cautious in his new quarters and took such thorough precautions about the admission of his patrons that the police could not obtain evidence against him. A few nights ago some policemen who were newcomers in the precinct were instructed to dress in civilian clothes and make an effort to get in. They did so and were successful. A policeman was then stationed outside the door to prevent the escape of any of the inmates, while his colleagues made arrests. While this duty was in progress, a young man, well known in the city, walked up to the door and was about to enter, when the policeman said, "You had better not go in there, young man. You had better go home." The young man did not recognize the officer, as he was without his uniform, and assured him that he did not need advice. He knew the character of the place, as he was a regular visitor, and insisted on going in. As it was "regular visitors," that were precisely the persons most wanted by the police, the officer allowed him to pass, and he was no sooner inside than he was arrested and marched off with the other prisoners. He wished then that he had heeded the friendly warning of the policeman. Such a wish many will feel one day who now turn a deaf ear to the warnings of the pulpit and of Christian friends, and insist on "walking in their own way." (Prov. 29: 1.)

Buried in Ruins.

Injuries which are likely to result fatally were received by the tenant of a house in Hoboken, N. J., recently. He had occupied a room on the first floor of the building for many years and lived alone. Some months ago he was notified that the house had been sold and the new owner intended to tear it down and rebuild it. The tenant was much annoyed and declared that he would not leave. A second notice was given him on November 1, and he was informed that the demolition would be begun before the end of the month. The man, however, persisted in remaining. Even when the men came to begin the work he would not leave and forbade them interfering with his home. As all persuasion failed he was put out by force and the men supposed that he had gone away. It appears that he returned and secretly re-entered his room. There he calmly set about preparing his breakfast. While he was so occupied, the men, unaware of his return, were busy on the roof. In a short time the chimney and part of the roof fell and the obstinate tenant was buried in the ruins. It was some time before he could attract attention, and when his cries were heard there was a difficulty in extricating him. It was then found that several of his ribs were broken and he was severely cut and bruised. He was taken to the hospital and his injuries treated, but he is not likely to recover. Many who wonder at the man's clinging to his home in spite of the warning that it would be demolished, are acting as he did themselves. Every man who sets his affections on this world and lives for it only, does so in spite of explicit warnings that it will be destroyed. (II. Pet. 3: 10-13.)

Perils in Tropical Fruits.

An importer of tropical fruits in New York has been giving to a reporter the results of his experience with tarantulas, scorpions and other disagreeable and dangerous immigrants from the South. He said that scarcely a cargo of bananas, or Jamaica oranges arrives without one or more of these creatures being among them. The tarantulas are the most common. They hide in the bunches of bananas near the stalk and fall out when the fruit is handled. "Our men," said the importer, "are always alarmed when one appears, and I do not wonder at it. They are most repulsive objects and I cannot resist shuddering when I see one. They are like an ordinary spider in shape, but much larger. I have seen many as large as my fist. Its legs are thick and strong, all bone and muscle and it glides over the floor so fast that the eye can scarcely follow it. Occasionally our men are bitten, for the tarantula when disturbed generally rushes straight at the disturber. We used to be much alarmed and would send the man in an ambulance to the hospital, but we have found that all that needs to be done is to wash the injured part with ammonia and bind it up in laudanum. The man suffers a good deal but is in no danger of death. It appears that the men never grow careless in handling the fruits, and it is a fact that a man from the tropics can always be identified by the cautious manner in which he lifts a board, or a box, or a bunch of bananas. The same caution would be wise in other matters. There are many amusements and pleasures in life, apparently harmeless, behind which spiritual danger lurks. Extreme vigilance and care must be used by those who indulge in them, lest they suffer injury. (Eccles. 11: 7-9).

Bound for the South Pole.

An attempt to penetrate the mysterious region of the Antarctic Circle is to be made by Dr. F. A. Cook, of Brooklyn, N. Y. He has had some experience of the difficulties to be encountered, having accompanied Lieut. Peary on his former expedition to the Arctic. Dr. Cook was the ethnologist of the party on that occasion. He believes that with proper equipment and with the experience which he gained with Lieut. Peary, it will be possible to reach the South Pole more easily than the North Pole. He proposes to sail from New York for the Island of Louis Phillippe in the extreme South. There he will leave a life boat with provisions. Thence he will steer due South and wait for an opening in the ice-pack. He hopes speedily to reach land, and will lay his steamer up in some well protected natural harbor, which he believes he can easily find. He expects to remain there during the Antarctic winter and complete his preparation for a tour of exploration in the following spring. When the sun appears after the long darkness, he will set out southward, proceeding as far as possible with his steamer. If, however, his progress is barred by the ice, he will use sledges. He intends taking sufficient dogs with him for the purpose. By one or the other means he hopes to reach the Pole. Should he, however, be prevented, he will retreat at the end of three months. He thinks that if his vessel is crushed by the ice, he will still be able to reach the Island of Louis Philippe, and, with the life-boat left there in preparation for such an emergency, make the voyage to the Falkland Islands. Dr. Cook knows that he is running great risks in taking this journey into an utterly unknown region; hence the careful preparation he is making to insure his safety. Would that the same careful preparation were made by every man for that passage which all must make beyond the grave, which must end in disaster for every one who enters upon it unprepared! (Luke 13: 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Some of the merchants of St. Paul, Minn., have given notice that they will not employ persons who frequent pool or gambling rooms.

The British Museum has received from Egypt the mummies of four persons who died during the days of the Hebrew Bondage in Egypt.

Evangelist H. O. Mills has been traveling in his Gospel Wagon through Michigan. He made a stay at Holly and held meetings in which the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches joined.

The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., has commenced a series of revival services in Detroit, Mich. The preliminary work under the care of Dr. Radcliffe was efficiently carried out, and Dr. Chapman entered upon his work with the hearty indorsement of all the churches.

A Fifth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Union will be held in Rev. Dr. D. J. Burrell's church, New York, this week. The Anniversary Sermon was preached by Dr. Burrell on Sunday, Dec. 10th. The Headquarters of the Union are at 203 Broadway, New York. Rev. J. H. Knowles, D.D., is its secretary. The Union will gladly aid in organizing local unions in the various cities.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings at Lima, O., have stirred the whole neighborhood. The Daily Republican-Gazette says that both church members and outsiders have been moved as never before. The meetings for men only were attended by over a thousand men and boys, and they rose in a body when the preacher asked those to stand up who had determined to lead a new life. It has been necessary to hold four meetings simultaneously to accommodate the crowds, there being no one audience room in the city capable of holding them. The press expects that the results of the services in the city will be deep and permanent.

Evangelist Norman Plass has been holding a twelve days' evangelistic meeting at Strongville, Ohio. More than sixty cards were signed, a majority of them by men, and many remarkable conversions have taken place.

Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Walton, who have labored successfully in the South African Mission field for several years in conjunction with Dr. Andrew Murray, are in New York for a period of rest and recuperation. They have a deeply interesting story to tell of Christian work at the Diamond Mines and in other difficult spheres in Southern Africa. Pastors who may desire to hear them can address them at this office.

The Russian Stundists are quitting the country in considerable numbers. A recent report says that the families of men who have taken any leading part in the movement, are voluntarily leaving their homes, selling all they possess, to settle either in some remote part of the Empire or else in the neighboring country of Rumania. There seems to be a widespread notion among these wretched brethren that a terrible day of persecution is about to break on them, and they are seeking a shelter.

Sir Andrew Clark, the famous English physician, who died recently, was a strong temperance man. Speaking of the results of intoxicants as he had witnessed them in his professional career, he said: "When I think of all this, I am disposed to rush to the opposite extreme, to give up my profession, to give up everything, and to go forth upon a holy crusade, preaching to all men—beware of this enemy of the race."

A German farmer living in Benton Co., Mo., while digging a ditch a few days ago on his farm found a medal of Wesley Chapel, John street, New York, the first Methodist Church in America. It is made of lead and antimony and is two inches in diameter. On one side is a likeness of John Wesley and on the other a representation of Wesley Chapel and the inscription "Dedicated by Philip Embury, October 30, 1768."

The cornerstone of a new mission building was laid on November 29 in New York at Sixtieth street and First Avenue. It will contain a chapel, a day nursery, a kindergarten and a reading-room. The cost of the building, amounting to $65,000, has been paid by Mr. Isaac H. Brokaw who desires thus to build a memorial for his son who lost his life two years ago at Long Branch while trying to rescue a drowning girl.

We are glad to learn from Mr. C. F. Cutter, the leader of the Fulton St. Prayer Meeting that many requests for prayer and and some striking testimonies of answers to prayer are sent to him from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He asks us to assure them that they are all faithfully noticed and complied with. He also sends the gratifying intelligence that two other cities have adopted the daily noon prayer meeting on the Fulton St. model. One of these is Salt Lake City, Utah, and the other a city in Georgia.

The first lady physician ever admitted to practice in Turkey is Miss Mary P. Eddy, daughter of Rev. W. W. Eddy, D.D., for more than forty years a missionary of the Presbyterian Board. Miss Eddy graduated last year from the New York Medical College. She went to Constantinople armed with letters from Secretary of State Gresham, professors of the college and prominent men and applied to the Sultan's government for a license. She was refused on the ground that women physicians were not allowed to practice in the Turkish dominions. Judge Terrell, our minister at Constantinople, has, however, induced the Sultan to make an exception in her case and she has received her diploma. She will commence work in Syria.

STRENGTH IN THE WOOD.

Preached last Sunday morning, Dec. 10, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

Text: I. Sam. 23: 16, "And Jonathan Saul's son arose, and went to David into the

THE world has repeatedly heard of the devoted attachment between Damon and Pythias. These two Syracusans were disciples of Pythagoras, and are justly celebrated for their loyal friendship and unfailing fidelity. Their friendship was so unwavering and unselfish that the tyrant pardoned Pythias and desired to be a partner in so noble a relationship. In the Bible we have several charming illustrations of a friendship equally sincere and beautiful. The world will never forget the idyllic simplicity and gentle pathos of the story of Ruth, the Moabitish woman, and of Naomi, her afflicted mother-in-law. The friendship between Paul the aged and Timothy the youthful disciple, has touched all hearts and has become classical and immortal. But nowhere, either in sacred or secular story, can we find a friendship more generous and unselfish, and more reciprocal than that between David and Jonathan. This friendship has often been admired and imitated, but it has never been surpassed, and seldom if ever equalled. Fiction never painted a picture so beautiful as these facts suggest and complete on the page of sacred history. The pen of inspiration has limned the portraits of these devoted friends and leaders of armies. The terms in which their friendship is described are as rhetorically beautiful as they are tenderly instructive. David says, "thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women," and Jonathan, as expressive of his highest ambition, says "thou shalt be king in Israel and I shall be next unto thee." Nothing in Hebrew poetry is more beautiful and touching than David's lament over Jonathan; nothing of an elegiac character in any of the poets is more perfect as a whole or more marked in its parts by striking images and tender thoughts. While any literature lasts, this elegy will remain as one of the noblest tributes which affection has ever produced. Tennyson's "In Memoriam," some of whose parts are melancholy as the moan of the ocean, is surpassed by this ancient Hebrew dirge. The text selected for this morning is a fine illustration of this noble friendship. Both in itself and in its setting it is worthy of our careful thought.

We notice, in the first place, the instrument of the strengthening which David received. Jonathan, the son of Saul, was the strengthener. He was in the fullest sense a brave and manly man. His name signifies a gift of God; it is the same in meaning as Theodore, which is simply its Greek form. As the eldest son of Saul, and the heir apparent to the throne, which David was divinely appointed to occupy, the relation between the two was peculiarly delicate; but to David in all his trials Jonathan was truly a gift of God. During the early part of Saul's reign the war with the Philistines gave Jonathan many opportunities of displaying his chivalrous and his princely qualities toward David. At [illegible] performed wonderful exploits, [illegible] by his armor-bearer, in [illegible] the garrison. His brav[illegible] is not surpassed by the [illegible] of any country, [illegible] knightly and chivalrous period. Romance nowhere, and his[illegible] valor or unwaverl[illegible] here on the part [illegible]. True friend[illegible] bravery. The fri[illegible] in their great trials fine[illegible]

Their friendship, so sacred in itself, was made all the sweeter by the adversity which both experienced. Their friendship conformed to the definition given by Pythagoras:

Friendship, one soul in two bodies.

Jonathan was also a loving man. The friendship between him and David is among the first instances found in the Bible of that passionate attachment which we find later in days of romance and history. No jealousy between these men marred the harmony of their constant devotion. Each found in the other that which neither found in his own family. Each was valiant and heroic in himself, and so each knew how to appreciate similar gifts in the other.

The Romantic Friendship.

Nothing can be more beautiful than the manner in which their friendship began. David bravely met, valiantly challenged and heroically conquered the boastful Goliath; and in that act of victory over the huge barbarian he completely won the heart of the noble Jonathan. Unselfish valor knows how rightly to esteem unselfish valor. From that day the heart of Jonathan was David's and the heart of David was Jonathan's. Jonathan enthusiastically admired the noble gifts of David, and he was willing ever after to risk his own life to preserve his friend from harm. That victory was in many respects the turning-point in David's life; but in no respect was it more important to him than because of the place which it secured for him on the throne of Jonathan's heart. Jonathan was as capable as he was valiant. Not more masterful was his father with the spear than was Jonathan with the bow; and the bow is always associated with his name and his deeds of war. In his first appearance he is closely associated with Saul as his companion; and the entire narrative shows the deep attachment which existed between father and son. The strength of this attachment is shown by the tragic effect on Saul when he determined to fulfil his vow, even "if it be Jonathan, my son." Jonathan is spoken of as and swift as an eagle." He was at home in climbing on his hands and feet up the face of cliffs, or in any other adventurous undertaking in war. But in nothing does his noble career so resplendently shine as in his friendship toward David. We read that "the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul."

This early affection was repeatedly confirmed by solemn compacts. The first of these confirmations was when Jonathan gave David his sword, his girdle, his bow, and his mantle as a pledge of his unalterable affection. His friendship was again shown when his father's insane rage flashed out against David. Jonathan interceded with Saul for David's life and was unsuccessful; but soon Saul's madness returned. David was obliged to flee; and by the stone of Ezel the second covenant was made; a covenant which was binding upon the posterity of both. Here we see Jonathan's love for his father as well as for his friend, his bitter disappointment at his father's unchanging wrath, and his love for and familiarity with the sports of archery. Tenderly these lovers part to meet only once more. Far away in the forest of Ziph, as we see in connection with the text, Saul's wrath still pursued David. Jonathan is filled with anxiety for the life of his friend; and he cannot longer forbear coming to him secretly in the wood. Tenderly does he give him encouragement and comfort in this trying hour. For the third time the covenant of affection between them is renewed; then they part never again to meet. We know nothing of the life of Jonathan until we hear the clash of arms and the groans of the dying in that awful battle of Gilboa. Our hearts grow sad and our eyes become moist as we learn that in the battle Jonathan with his two brothers and his father fell fighting the enemies of their country. O fatal Gilboa, O insane Saul, O heroic and beloved Jonathan! We stand a moment before the dead bodies of fathers and brothers; and there see at Jabesh Gilead. Later we learn that his remains were removed with those of his father to Zelah in Benjamin. We draw near to David as he learns the news of Jonathan's death; and we hear once more the sad and eloquent strains of his matchless elegy. As the years pass we see David showing kindness to the son of Jonathan for his father's sake.

Jonathan as the strengthener of David was truly a generous friend. He was the king's son, but David was only a shepherd boy, As heir apparent to the throne David's promotion would defeat his legitimate ambitions and his natural aspirations. One of the noblest characteristics of John the Baptist was that he joyfully decreased that Jesus Christ might gloriously increase. No evidence of his divine nobility could be greater than his willingness to take a secondary place; and this characteristic we find beautifully illustrated in Jonathan. He occupied a most delicate position standing between David and the throne. He well knew that God was to give that throne to the young shepherd of Bethlehem, but in the intensity of his affection he loved to think of David as His Master and King.

His brightest dreams suggested nothing more beautiful for himself than that he should be next to David in friendship while David reigned over Israel. Indeed it appears that he cared more for the honor of being next to David than for occupying any other place of influence in the kingdom. His position was delicate also as mediator between his father and his friend; but he was loyal and loving to both. The early affection toward his father continued to the very last. Twice Saul would have sacrificed Jonathan notwithstanding his great affection for him. Such a man as Jonathan is a friend in adversity. Well might David prize his visit now in his trying position in the lonely forest. Happy are we in business relations, in family affections, and in church friendships when we may have a friend like Jonathan to strengthen our hand in God. May God help us to prize such friends; may God help us in our measure to be such friends to others in their time of need.

We notice, in the second place, the place of strengthening—"in the wilderness." David was in the woods. The wisest and best of men sometimes get into the woods. Then, if ever, they need true friends. David was the anointed of God; he was appointed to a glorious destiny. Yet he had trials numerous and severe. It has been well said that God had only one Son without sin, but he did not have even one son without sorrow.

David's Sorrows

were conducive to his growth in grace, and to his matchless power over men in this day. But for his sorrows he had never sung his peerless songs, Out of his deepest griefs came his noblest psalms. Out of Bunyan's prison came his Pilgrim to walk forevermore through all the nations of the earth. Christ himself was never more the object of God's complacent love than when he bowed in the garden and hung on the cross. The manifold sorrows of the apostle Paul gave him his manifold forms of wisdom and of endearing influence. A rugged wilderness is often the place of noblest inspiration. David's foes were now bitter and powerful. After the songs of the women, who immortalized his triumphs, came the jealousy of Saul. Armed men encircled David's home. He was forced to fly. We have seen him with Jonathan at the cairn of Ezel; we now see him an outcast; we see him in the cave of Adullam; and we see him in the forest of Hareth. Thousands are after him to take his like. They watch for his footprints on the hills; they hunt him as a partridge. His friends are few; his enemies are many. The pursuit was hot; the prospect was dark. Delivered from the hand of Saul at Keilah, he is soon a fugitive in the rugged wilderness of Ziph; and the Ziphites are ready to betray him to Saul. Here once more is the riddle of religious experience. Marvelous is it that the noblest souls are often the deepest sufferers. The heroes and heroines of faith are evermore the sons and daughters of trial. If ever we need Jonathans it is when we are in the wilderness. David's faith must at times have wavered during these fearful experiences; and doubtless the thoughts of these times are reflected in many of his psalms. Here we see the mysteries of God's providences and the contradictory experiences of human life. It must at times have seemed to David as if the old prophet Samuel had been deceived, or was a deceiver; it must have seemed at times as if God had utterly forgotten him. With the tenderness of a true friend Jonathan turned his thoughts away from Saul to God, away from the sorrows of his trying life to the peace which comes from God as

The Everlasting Refuge.

Blessed are those friends who strengthen our hand in God! Times will come to all of us when heart and flesh will fail; times when the sun will not shine by day nor the moon and stars by night. We must all have our experiences with David in the woods. We must have our trials with David's Son and Lord in Gethemane and on Calvary. Let us not lose our hope. To us as to David will come some noble Jonathan; to us as to Jesus will come angels to strengthened us. To us will come Jesus himself, with his never-failing promise and ever-blessed presence.

We notice, in the third place, the manner of the strengthening. Jonathan's very presence was a source of strength. He came at the risk of his life to help his friend. He came in the spirit of him who was the gift of God, the divine Jonathan. His presence alone cheered David like the light, and his words soothed him like notes from his own tuneful harp. There is often wonderful power to help in a warm grasp of the hand. A sympathetic word or look may speak volumes. We ought more and more to perform personal ministries for God and souls. We too much do our we too often want our staff laid upon the suffering ones when we ought ourselves to go with our living, loving presence. "Fear not," was the keynote of Jonathan's address. He can assure David of divine preservation from threatening danger; he can point him to the divine purpose, which plainly declared that he should be king; and he can renew his covenant with David, pledging him faithful service and unchanging love. Next to the guidance and plesence of God are the counsel and affection of true friends. Touching was this last interview between David and Jonathan. Thrice blessed are we when we can be Jonathans to some troubled and sorrowful David. But most of all did Jonathan strengthen David's hand in God. Beautiful is his personal friendship; more blessed is the divine presence. Saul cannot hurt him whom God anoints. It was the Father's good pleasure to give David the kingdom, and no insane Saul can effectually thwart the divine purpose. Better that Jonathan lift David's thoughts directly to God, than that he should tell him of the levying troops, the massing of armies, or the shouts of victory on battlefields. David now had God's promise regarding his elevation to the throne. Blessed are they who rest on God's promise!

The Type.

Precious lessons are suggested by this narrative. 1. Jonathan was the mediator between Saul and David; but he failed to secure a reconciliation. But Christ, our Jonathan, is the true and successful mediator between sinful men and a holy God. He is the blessed Davsman. He brings us into sweet harmony and loving communion with God. 2. Jonathan, though a loving friend, had to take leave of David in the woods; he could not remain with his friend. But Christ never leaves those who trust him. He sticketh closer than a brother. Christ is the friend at all times, and a brother born for adversity. Never were David and Jonathan to meet again. Death was to break their companionship; but Jesus is the friend from whom we need never be severed. He comes to us in the wood, and abides with us until he brings us into a wealthy place. 3. Jonathan endangered his life for David; but Christ gave his life for you and me. O, what a friend we have in Jesus! Let us go to him now in our weakness, helplessness and sinfulness. Wandering in the wilderness of sin we can lay our hands in his. He will strengthen us in God, and when all our wanderings in the wilderness of this life are over, he will present us to his Father and ours amid the songs of saints and the shouts of angels. Blessed Jesus, thou art our true, our divine Jonathan!

MRS. W. P. WESTON.

JOLIET, ILL.:—This morning after Thanksgiving, with the thermometer ranging anyway from below zero, the expressman rings my door-bell and hands me your treasure From Manger to Throne for treasure it is, coming as it does—warming my heart and filling me with delight. It far exceeds my expectations and implants within me the desire that all in whom I am interested might be sharers in my delight. MARTHA B. THORNTON.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.:—From Manger to Throne is most interesting—written in attractive style, printed on extra quality of paper, with clear, good sized type and delightful to handle. With an excellent picture, photographed from life, on nearly every page, and taken very recently, showing just how the places look to-day, and bringing the scenes of Christ's daily life distinctly before you. It is far beyond my expectations, and is worth many times its cost.

MARY WASHINGTON NAME FUND.

BEFORE this reaches the eyes of those who have kindly interested themselves in the project of raising a suitable monument to the memory of MARY, THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON, the graceful obelisk bearing her name and erected by her countrywomen, will mark the spot where she was laid to rest in 1789. It is with sincerest gratitude to the hundreds of good and patriotic women who have aided in the enterprise, that the managers of the Memorial Association witness the result of years of patient work and hope. The response to their appeal for the removal of what they considered a national disgrace—the ruined, unfinished pile above the grave of a good woman who gave a great man to the world and a father to our country—emboldens them to ask further contributions to defray every expense attendant upon the erection of the monument. It should be entirely free from encumbrance, and when this is accomplished, the grounds should be put in order, and the memorial suitably enclosed and cared for in time to come. Unless a fund is raised for this purpose, the new stone will soon be defaced by relic-hunters and the throng of silly sight-seers whose propensity to leave their autographs in all high and holy places cannot be repressed by general rules forbidding such desecration.

Now that the monument is built, it must be kept clean and whole. I therefore call the attention of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the suggestion made some months ago, in these columns that every woman bearing the honored name of "Mary," who reads this paper, should forward to me, in stamps, if convenient, the sum of twenty-five cents, or more, to help on this noble undertaking.

There have been received since the last acknowledgment was made, the following contributions:

In memory of "Little Mary," from Newark, N. J., 50c; Mary E. F., Talmage, Neb., 25c; Mary A. H., Ravenswood, West Virginia, 25c; Mary L. H., Oakdale, L. I., 25c; two mothers by the name of "Mary," 50c. Total, $1.75. MARION HARLAND.

THE WAR IN HEAVEN.

The Meaning of the Imagery in the Vision of Angelic Conflict.

BY THE LATE SIR S. A. BLACKWOOD.*

THE words "in heaven," used in Rev. 12: 1 and 3 need a word or two of explanation. The Apostle says: "There appeared a great wonder [margin, sign] in heaven." "And then appeared another wonder in heaven." Primarily, the term must be regarded as describing that which the Seer actually beheld as they appeared moving on the heaven, the firmament, or what we should call the sky, stretched above that part of the earth where the predicted events were to take place; and it was in or against this background of sky, or heaven, that the great signs appeared. The portents which the Apostle witnesses are there seen in shadowy and awe-inspiring forms. Such a use of the expression is by no means uncommon among us, as when we speak of "the political horizon," "the gathering clouds," etc.

But while the expression describes the outward appearance exhibited in the vision, we must not fail to notice that, in the second place, it had a symbolical meaning. Depicting, together with the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon and stars, the place of power and authority, and the rulers of this world. When, therefore, it was "in heaven" that the Seer beheld both the sunclothed woman, and the great red dragon with the seven heads, the meaning would be that in some way or other the two bodies or systems represented by these symbols would, for a time at least, be occupying, and that concurrently, positions of power in the political firmament,

It is that last and fiercest contest for supremacy between the powers of Paganism and Christianity that the Seer is now called to behold. The shadowy forms of angelic hosts are seen filling the regions of the air. Against the dazzling myriads of the elect angels, which excel in strength, led by the Archangel himself, contend the dragon and his angels. The imagery is in keeping with Old Testament representations and phraseology.

Eighteen hundred years before the angels of God had met Jacob as he went on his way, and when he saw them he said, "That is God's host, and he called the name of that place Mahanaim" (or, the two hosts). Six hundred years later, in the prophetic song of triumph in which Deborah and Barak the son of Abinoam celebrated the victory of Israel over the kings of Canaan, the belief in superhuman intervention was expressed as the words rang out, "They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." To Daniel it was revealed that the destinies of Israel and the fate of empires were the subject of strife between principalities and powers in heavenly places; for the glorious Revealer of Mysteries declared that the prince of the kingdom of Persia had withstood him one-and-twenty days, and that at a certain time Michael, the great prince which stood for the defence of the children of Daniel's people, should arise on their behalf.

The meaning of the terrific visionary conflict waged in mid-heaven between the angels who are sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation, and the prince of the power of the air, the leader of wicked spirits in heavenly places, could hardly fail to be understood by him who witnessed the marvellous scene. And it was no doubt with intense joy that he beheld the issue of the supernatural combat, the hosts of darkness vanquished, their place "not found any more in heaven," and that he heard the loud voice saying in heaven, "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ."

No less than five times does the seer describe the overthrow of the Satanic powers: "The great dragon was cast out." "He was cast out into the earth." "His angels were cast out with him." "The accuser of our brethren is cast down." "The dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth."

"And then he records the secret of the victory, the threefold means whereby they who had waged the conflict on earth, of which the "airy pageant" was the symbolic representation, had vanquished the great adversary, the accuser of the brethren.

"They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death."

GIFTS TO CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Dec. 24. Matt. 2: 11; Ps. 40: 6-8.

THE impulse to offer gifts or sacrifices in approaching the Deity is universal. Missionaries and explorers find it among savages to this day and wherever we find traces of extinct races we perceive that they had their sacrificial systems. In the ancient civilizations, too, the sacrifice had a conspicuous place. Left to himself, man conceives of a Being whose wrath must be dreaded and whose favor is to be desired and who can be propitiated by gift, or sacrifice. A few there have been, of deeper spiritual insight, who declared that God took no delight in burnt offerings and would not be pleased with thousands of rams, nor ten thousand rivers of oil, but required of man only that he do justly, love mercy and walk humbly with his God. These were the men whose ears, as the Psalmist says, had been opened to heavenly intimations. But these messengers were little heeded and to this day and among ourselves, there are still people who appear to believe it is possible to compound by gifts of money with the Almighty for infractions of his law. Mistaken as these are, gift and sacrifice hold their place in all true worship. As the Christian is bound to holiness and purity of life more stringently now that he is not under the law, so greater sacrifices are due from him than the law ever required. His position is that of the redeemed slave, who owes himself and all he has to his Redeemer. He is bought with a price and belongs wholly to the Being whose blood was shed for his ransom. In taking upon him the name of Christian, or Christ's man, he acknowledges his obligations both as to person and property. He belongs to Christ and holds himself at his Lord's disposal. If he rightly estimates his obligations he feels bound to render service in some form. The protestations of love and gratitude, which he utters in hymn and prayer, will not satisfy his conscience, he will long to prove them by act and life. As a man will grudge nothing that is needed by a dearly loved brother or friend, so the Christian will delight in proving his love for his Lord. No law is needed in his case, he labors and gives "in his name" and "for Christ's sake." And opportunities surround him on every hand. Calls for service come from far and near. Wherever, either in his own city, or some distant land, there are souls in darkness there is opportunity. He may speak the word of light himself, or he may toil that others, who go to speak it, may be supported. His needy brethren, to whom he is bound in the bond of a common love of Christ, are his special charge, left to his care by the explicit words of his Lord. His gifts to them are gifts to Christ. His whole life is a service and all he is and has is consecrated to God. Nothing less is required of him and in proportion as he lives up to his obligations, is he blessed and enjoys the favor of his Lord.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

[illegible] steadily down to work on the reading course and in their departments of aggressive work. There is much concern at headquarters over the number who are adopting the Bay View course of reading in preference to that prescribed by the board. The utmost liberty is allowed in this matter, but the chapters are admonished that loyalty to the church and the board is appreciated. The fact that the Bay View course is better from an interdenominational point of view is not altogether an advantage in the league which was founded with the express purpose of fostering denominational spirit. An enthusiastic convention was held recently at Neneveh, Pa. It continued two days and attracted friends from all parts of the Washing, Pa., District. Among the speakers were Rev. W. J. R. Moore, Rev. O. J. Watson, and Rev. John J. Hill of Washington, Pa. There are now twenty-four chapters of the league in the Dayton, O., District, with an aggregate membership of 1,800. An effort is being made to endow a bed to bear the name of the League in Christ's Hospital. An excellent practice which is found to promote fraternal relations has been adopted on the suggestion of the local chapter at Sandy Hill, N. Y. It is a quarterly union meeting of the league with the three Christian Endeavor Societies of the village. These meetings are much enjoyed, as they are always harmonious and suggestive. The Swedish Emmanuel church in Brooklyn, N.Y., has an energetic chapter in connection with it. It has a membership of 100, and all are thoroughly in earnest. Last year, in addition to raising $308 for general purposes, it did an extensive work among the sick poor and raised a sum of money to supply the parsonage throughout with new carpets.

THREE PROMINENT CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS.

Among the friends and advocates of the great organization which has with a rapidity unparalleled in the history of the Christian Church spread from city to city and from land to land the three eminent men whose portraits appear on this page occupy a high place. Their earnestness and zeal in the cause of Christ found in the broad principles of the Christian Endeavor movement an agency of far-reaching power and each in his own sphere has labored for its extension and development.

Mr. Alfred E. Hutton is the President of the British Council of the Society. He is a Member of Parliament and a philanthropist. Although only twenty-eight years old he has achieved a national reputation as a friend and benefactor of the working men. He is a successful business man whose manufactory in Yorkshire is one of the largest in the woolen industry. He was educated at the famous Congregational school at Mill-hill and at Trinity College, Cambridge. After his graduation, he entered actively into Christian work in his native town of Eccleshill. His days were devoted to business, but in the evenings some work at the Young Men's Christian Association or among the poor, found him occupation and on Sundays, mission work and the superintendence of a large Sunday School claimed his energies. Three year ago he secured the property of an old church which he opened as "The Working Men's Free Assembly Rooms," and organized a series of entertainments there which have been a great benefit to the neighborhood. The artisans now manage it themselves and have turned it to practical account in many ways. On Sunday and week days all the year round the building is thronged and the religious and social life of the town has been greatly helped by the institution. At the Parliamentary election last year Mr. Hutton was enthusiastically elected as member for Morley and is proving himself a wise and far-sighted legislator. As an evidence of his religious character it is worthy of notice that during the excitement of the political campaign he was never once absent from his place in the Sunday School or any other of his Church engagements. At the recent Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies he was chosen President of the National Council.

Rev. Leander S. Keyser is already well-known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Three serial stories from his pen have appeared in its columns and we rejoice to know that they were the means of doing much good. One of them under the title of "The Only Way Out," was blessed to the conversion of several sceptics, who are now laboring successfully for Christ. His other stories, "The Epochs of a Life" and "Why he Wavered" have, also, had a beneficial influence. Mr. Keyser is the Lutheran Vice-President of the Ohio Christian Endeavor Union. He is pastor of the Third Lutheran Church of Springfield, O. He is thirty-six years of age and is a native of Tuscarawas County, Ohio. He became a school teacher at the age of sixteen, and afterward studied at Kalamazoo College, Michigan, and Indiana State University. During his college course he was noted for his avowed scepticism, but after his graduation he came under the influence of a pious uncle who succeeded in leading him to Christ. Mr. Keyser determined to give his life to the ministry and went to Wertenberg College at Springfield, O., for a theological course. His first settlement was at La Grange, Ind., from which place after a successful pastorate he removed to Elkhart, Ind., where he was greatly blessed. In his new pastorate at Springfield, O., he early availed himself of the Christian Endeavor movement, and has introduced it to other churches of his denomination.

Rev. J. R. Cowan enjoys the distinction of having organized the first Junior Society of Christian Endeavor. In the Congregational Church of Tabor, Iowa, of which he is still pastor, Mr. Cowan held a meeting of children in March, 1884, and explained to them the principles of Christian Endeavor. A Young People's Society already existed in the church which Mr. Cowan organized early in the history of the movement, and it had done good service. He believed that the children also would be benefited, and the meeting was the practical outcome of his faith. The pledge was taken by three boys and seven girls, the first to sign being Raymond G. Brooks, who is now a student in Yale Divinity School. Although Mr. Cowan's experiment was looked upon a little doubtfully at first, experience has proved its value and the number of Junior Societies has grown with phenomenal rapidity. Mr. Cowan is an earnest believer in Christian Endeavor methods and principles and one of the most devoted and energetic friends of the Society.

A Day with the Destitute.

What a Lady City Missionary found to do among the New York Tenements—Famishing Families Relieved.

IT has been truly said that one half the world scarcely knows how the other half lives. Practical charity—the sort that goes out among the poor and destitute, and learns their true condition, instead of informing itself at second-hand from printed reports—is unfortunately beyond the power of a majority of the philanthropically disposed, who thus miss many valuable and touching object-lessons in kindness. Although in every large American city there are now many well-organized and faithfully conducted charitable bodies, whose chief task is to succor the needy and the deserving poor, there are thousands upon thousands of households whose members suffer on in silence, rather than permit themselves to be classed as "charity folks." It is to these, no less deserving than the regular proteges of charity organizations, that the occasional aid afforded privately comes with the warmest welcome.

Miss Jennie Gilmour, a lady who has been engaged in missionary and religious work for many years, at the suggestion of the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, undertook to search out some of the more needy and deserving among those hidden cases of destitution, on the east side of New York City. Her experience is so full of pathetic interest that we give it from her own lips:

"I started out on the day before Thanksgiving," she said, "and although I have had considerable experience in Christian work of this character, I was surprised at the extent of the misery and destitution I saw. To tell of even half the places I visited would make too long a story, so I will relate only a few. In one room on the second floor in the rear of a tenement, I found a family of eight, almost starving for lack of food. The husband was out of work. A block off, in another tenement, was a widow with five children famishing and half-clad. At another place, a mother lay with a broken limb in the dingy rear room of a tenement, the home neglected and the little ones hungry. On leaving this wretched room, I found, not far distant, several most pitiful cases, where the parents, either through sickness or misfortune, were unable to provide for their children. In one hovel, where a sick husband, his wife and five small children herded, the only bread-winner was the mother, who sold papers for a living! On visiting Washington Market, I found the dealers there kindly disposed when I stated that I desired to make some purchases for these poor families. At a liberal reduction I bought turkey, chicken, cranberries, vegetables and flour enough to supply all, and to drive away the wolf of hunger from these wretched homes for a day at least.

"Next I went to a grocery store and bought jellies, preserves, grapes and crackers for two sick mothers who lived in East 28th and 29th streets. The next hour or more was occupied in charity of another sort. I had found two families—one in 43rd st., and the other in 25th street,—who were bitterly bewailing their misfortune in being threatened with eviction by their landlords. What that means, at the opening of winter, to families with little children none too warmly clad, can be readily appreciated by anyone whose heart has a spark of sympathy in it. I paid their rent—$8 apiece—and the restoration of their homes made them happy indeed.

"Then there were some who needed other things more than food. On East 22nd and East 28th, near 2nd Avenue, were two households sitting in rooms that had an arctic chill—and in which I, though warmly wrapped, could not repress a shiver. They had had no fire for days and nothing to buy fuel with. Would they like a bushel of coal? 'Oh!' they said with a faint smile, 'that wasn't to be thought of.' I called on a nearby dealer and they each got half a ton that afternoon. It will warm the babies for a week or two at least, poor things! Then there were three families where the younger element appeared to have almost given up wearing clothes—at least what they did wear was the thinnest apology. They had something to eat and as the clothing question seemed the most pressing, I arranged for warm garments of plain, strong goods and for stout shoes for those that needed them the worst.

"These people," Miss Gilmour added, "were only a few of thousands similarly situated, who endure privations that the busy, prosperous, well-fed and well-housed portion of mankind have no idea of. My day's duty ended only after the sum entrusted to me as almoner for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had been expended and darkness had set in. I could not but admire the patient fortitude I witnessed, even where the suffering was the sharpest and the misery most apparent."

On the same day, a number of the philanthropic organizations of the East Side distributed among the poor in their respective neighborhoods, bread supplied by the proprietor of this journal, the only condition being that it should be given to the really needy and no other. The Industrial School at No. 91 Rivington street distributed three hundred loaves, the Church of Sea and Land, Henry street, three hundred, the Industrial School, No. 125 Lewis street, one hundred and fifty, the Hebrew Sheltering House, No. 210 Madison street, one hundred and fifty, The King's Daughters of Hope Chapel, No. 77 Madison street, twenty-five, and seventy-five loaves were apportioned among individual distributors. Every loaf was placed where most needed.

The present winter, for various reasons, is an unusually hard one among the poor all over the country. Among the readers of this journal there are thousands of men and women of pure and elevated Christian character, who take a deep interest in relief work. To those who can give the time to the work, we would say: Look around in your own neighborhood and search out the really needy. Remember that even a loaf of bread is a welcome gift to those who are without food, and that your smallest effort, if put forth in the name of him who fed the hungry, and who commanded his disciples to do so also, will return to you with a multiplied blessing.

GIRL LIFE IN JAPAN—A SERVANT MAID AT THE WELL.

Little Courtesies.

The little courtesies of life, the "thank yous," the "pleases," tell in brightening it, as do the small considerations shown in everyday affairs. How true it is that virtues can be cultivated by perseverance, courage and the higher strength! Pleasantness, namely, the power of saying bright, cheery things, is a virtue.

For every evil under the sun
[illegible]
If no remedy, try not to mind it.

THE ORPHAN.

I HEAR the soft winds sighing
Through every bush and tree,
Where parents dear are lying,
Away from love and me.
Tears from my eyes are starting,
And sorrow shades my brow;
Sad was the hour of parting—
I am an orphan now.

My heart is very lonely,
My spirit drear and sad;
'Twas their dear presence only
That made my spirit glad.
From morning until even,
Care rests upon my brow,
They're gone from me to Heaven—
I am an orphan now.

They're living with the Saviour,
In that bright land so fair,
Their sorrows o'er forever,
Sin never enters there,
And soon, oh joy! they'll meet me
With crowns upon their brow,
They're happy with the angels,
And I'm an orphan now.

—MARY E. WATERS.

GIRLHOOD IN JAPAN.

YOUTH in Japan is not by any means the perfunctory period some writers have described. It is true that in that far-away country, life is slow and tranquil by contrast with our western ways, but it certainly loses nothing of its attractiveness on that account, if indeed it does not gain in those qualities that go to make up the pure, sincere, steadfast character.

Here is a picture, presented by a writer in the "Japan Evangelist" of the daily routine of a young girl in the average household: "Early in the morning, before the household is stirring, she is up and at her tasks. With the sun to greet her with his first golden rays, she is at the well drawing water. Hers is a strong arm. She carries a good honest bucket whose bottom is made to hold water. The bucket comes up full to the brim. The water is clear and sparkling, reflecting the bright eyes, rosy cheeks and glossy black hair of the girl who works so cheerfully. On her way back to the house, she will stop, it may be, to arrange a few flowers in a pot near the entrance; for she is in sympathy with many a choice plant. She is essentially a woman. The children learn to love her and seek her early in the kitchen at her morning work. The master and mistress trust her. The place of her service becomes her home. She is not a mere slave. She may occasionally visit her friends and relatives. She has her joys and sorrows, her hopes and disappointments, her loves and hates in her little world. Drawing water for the kitchen, the teapot, the wash and the bath-house, is one of the tasks at which we most frequently see her; and it is the one that brings up pleasant recollections. . . . .

"The first thing I heard on waking was the familiar sound of some one drawing water. There at the well was the young girl. I soon won her sympathy. She ran in and called her master. He came out and it is not an exaggeration to say that for the next two days I was treated like a welcome guest in that mountain home. The best room and the best bed were put at my disposal. The children soon overcame their timidity in the presence of the foreigner and took great pains to please him with flowers gathered from the garden and the mountains. Father and mother both entertained me with quaint and interesting pictures—drawings handed down as heirlooms from generation to generation. In return I told them of my former life and home beyond the seas. The girl went by jinrikisha to Tokyo and entered one of the larger Girls' Schools. She is now an honored member of Christian society. Once a year she sends me, as a token of her gratitude, a bunch of morning-glories."

Do Something.

You cannot set the world right, or the times, wrote Phillips Brooks; but you can do something for the truth; and all you can do will certainly tell, if the work you do is for the Master, who gives you your share, and so the burden of responsibility is lifted off. This assurance makes peace, satisfaction and purpose possible, even in the partial work done upon earth. Go to the man who is carving a stone for a building; ask him where is that stone going, to what part of the temple; and how is he going to get it into place, and what does he do? He points you to the builder's plans. This is one stone of many. So when men ask how your achievement is going into God's plan, point to your Master, who keeps the plans.

"WAS that a drop of rain upon my nose?" Mrs. Barnes cried, blithely. "You were sensible in not wearing your new hat to-night, and I foolish in venturing out in one which I cannot afford to have spoiled, but I do not care to pay too dearly for the lesson."

A favorite supper-dish kept warm over hot water until he had finished the day's labors, and a cup of fresh black coffee made by his wife's deft hands after they got home, did their part toward restoring the good man to his wonted serenity and banishing the now unwelcome image of the intelligent stranger who after all, might have simulated rapt attention to a plain talk prepared for the more spiritually-minded of his own flock, who would compose his audience on a wet night.

The more imaginative wife did not dismiss the subject so easily from her silent thoughts.

"That woman's face haunts me," she soliloquized over her mending-basket, when her husband had withdrawn to his study, renewed in body and spirit. "I could not keep my eyes from wandering to her while William was speaking. And the voice too, I could be sure went with it in my mind. Poor, dear William!" here she smiled in affectionate amusement,—"It was thoughtless in me to rub his fur the wrong way by my inconsiderate talk. I never dreamed of intimating that she was a bad woman. There was not a sign of that sort of thing about her except the misery in a face I seem to recollect as happy and smiling."

Half an hour afterward she tapped at her husband's study door. Gentle birth and breeding had made her punctilious in the practice of the smallest courtesies of life.

She said, "I beg your pardon," when she failed to catch the hurried or mumbled speech of a servant, and never entered the door of a member of her family without knocking. She was a comely body, with perfect teeth, expressive brown eyes and the clear brunette complexion was like Olivia's —"ingrain." Just now her face was youthful under the flush and flash of excitement.

"William, dear! I am positive that I know that woman!" was her introductory outburst, as the opening door revealed the reverend student bending over his desk.

He looked up with labored mildness.

"What woman, my love?"

"Excuse me! What a blunderer I am! The stranger at the chapel this evening. And so will you be when I remind you that you were at her wedding eighteen—almost nineteen years ago. Don't you recollect Alice Lanier, who married that handsome, fascinating, shiftless Ernest Paull? She and I were dear friends at school, and until we were both of us married. I declare I have no patience with myself for not recognizing her at once to-night. Yet she is so sadly changed that I never thought of my old friend. I saw the notice of her father's death two or three years ago, and ought to have written to her. There is no doubt of that. But you know how selfishly we let such opportunities slip by, and I had lost her address, and other matters crowded upon me,—and so I didn't do the decent and kind thing. The last I heard of her, she [illegible] away up town, near the High Bridge somewhere,—and New York is such a howling wilderness. There must be some[illegible] absorption in one's selfish interests as to leave no time and thought for others, no matter how dearly we loved them once. I was very fond of Alice. She was one of the [illegible] charming women I ever knew. It hurts me to the quick of my heart to compare her face as I saw it an hour ago, with what it was [illegible]"

She had run herself down at last, and sat [illegible] availed himself of the gap to insert some judicial questions.

"'Shiftless' and 'fascinating,' did you call her husband? What else do you know of him? Were you acquainted with him before their marriage?"

"Very slightly. I never saw him after the wedding. You may recollect—and you probably don't,—that we could not attend the reception given to them at her brother's, Mr. Roger Lanier's, on their return from a year abroad—their bridal tour. Elizabeth was just six weeks old and I could not leave her."

"Woman's chronology!" interpolated Dr. Barnes, indulgent of the weakness. "That fixed the date of the marriage in your mind."

She nodded decidedly, coloring as she laughed.

"Of course it did! Some poet has made a calendar of the flowers. The mother's way of reckoning time is prettier and more poetical too, to my mind, to say nothing of its infallibility. Never dispute a date determined by a baby's age. I wonder if poor Alice has living children. I cannot describe to you with what a shock I identified as my gay-spirited, prosperous school-fellow the stranger in mourning that was almost shabby, and with such a woe-worn face. I felt as if I had seen a ghost. What could have brought her to our chapel? or, to Brooklyn at all? and out alone on such a disagreeble night,—and in Mendebras Avenue, of all places in Brooklyn? There is a mystery about the whole affair. Then, the way in which she broke out in that last hymn! Her voice sings in my ears yet. William, I cannot forgive myself for not recognizing her then and there. The conviction is so strong upon me that she is in some trouble."

"My blessed child! how you run on! Even if the to-you-mysterious stranger be your old acquaintance—which, mark you, I do not admit as a certainty—the incident is simple and unremarkable. For aught you know, she may be living in Brooklyn and have felt some curiosity to hear the husband of her former friend preach, granting that nothing else led her to attend divine service. It is clear that she did not recognize you, or she would have waited to speak to you. Eighteen years have changed you as well as herself. For the better—allow me to say —" the genuine affection that underlay the thin crust of conceit fostered by parish adulation, breaking through in an appreciative gleam, as he surveyed the matron who was ten years his junior and looked fully fifteen years younger. "But time exacts tribute of us all. The comeliness of forty-five is not the bloom of twenty."

For once the wife was unmindful of the conjugal compliment. Her elbow on the arm of her chair, her cheek on her hand, she was gazing into the past.

"Maybe she shrank from meeting me!" she said, thoughtfully. "Times have evidently altered for the worse with her. She was always proud. She came of old Huguenot stock, and they thought a great deal of family honor. There were three sisters, one lives in San Francisco, another in England. Both are older than Alice. The only living brother, Roger Lanier, was especially fond of her. He was one of the best, yet proudest men I ever saw—a model of business integrity. I see his name in the papers now and then, in connection with benevolent and religous enterprises. He is very rich, I imagine. I shouldn't think he would let Alice suffer for want of money."

"It is highly improbable," said Dr. Barnes, dryly, glancing at his manuscript. It was Friday night and his first sermon for Sunday was unfinished. "Perhaps she is a widow."

"Oh, I think not! It is more likely that he has been unsuccessful in business. She was not in widow's weeds. You asked what I know about Ernest Paull. He was a banker, or a broker, or something that sounded rich, and promised to make him richer. Papa thought him visionary and unstable, I recollect, and only 'hoped my friend had chosen wisely.' You know what that means when a man like Papa says it. But"—starting briskly up and apologetically—"I won't detain you any longer. I could not help rushing in like a whirlwind the instant the truth broke in upon me. You won't sit up late, will you, darling?"

As she passed into the hall the monotonous drip of rain upon the skylight overhead caught her ear, and she drew herself together with a shrug of conscious comfort as a bird tucks his head under his wing when "the north winds do blow." Home and family warmth were blessings worth being thankful for on a stormy night. She went down-stairs to lock up the house for the night. William would not think of it for hours to come. Instead of closing the front parlor shutter, she lowered the gas, raised the window and looked out into the street, moved by an impulse she could not define. It was in English phrase, "a nasty night," the sidewalks and round paving stones shining greasily under the street-gas, the rain falling in hair-like streams, close and steady, Without being bitterly cold, the air made her flesh crawl. The pastor's wife was not, it is superfluous to remark, a rich woman, but her nest was cosy, her life, albeit not exempt from the trials incident to the changes and chances of clerical existence, was sheltered and honorable. Her William had his ways like other men, but love had piloted her among the reefs, whirlpools and shallows of these for twenty-two years, and she no longer feared or was annoyed by them. She had perfect trust in his sterling virtues, in the sincerity of his piety and in his love for herself. Experience had taught her the marvellous art of supplementing her partner's deficiencies without letting him suspect that she did him this good turn, and,—a more marvellous thing still—without lowering her own respect for him.

All this passed so rapidly through her brain that she could hardly have traced the links of the chain of reverie. Thoughts of the three children given into arms that opened in rapturous gratitude to receive them as God's choicest earthly gifts; of troops of friends, tried and true; of opportunities for serving the Master, and her kind—overflowed her heart with a sudden glow and rush.

"Dear life! sweet life! full life!" she breathed inarticulately, tears warming eyelids already chilled by the misting rain.

A woman's figure passed between her and the street-lamp nearest the minister's house. It was wrapped in a long black cloak, glistening with rime; the eves looked straight forward; the yellow light struck across a face that was haggard and rigid.

"Alice!" called Mrs. Barnes, tentatively.

The apparition was so unexpected that she could scarcely credit the fidelity of her own eyes. She might, also, she reasoned swiftly, be mistaken in fancying that the woman was the same she had seen in the chapel. Much thinking upon the incident might have heated her imagination. She could have believed that the figure already quite beyond her window, faltered and glanced from right to left. Mrs. Barnes leaned over the sill, and repeated the cautious call in wooing intonations:

"Alice! Alice!"

Then she ran to the front door and opened it. The street, as far as she could see up and down, was empty of any living presence. The dimmed lamps and the close web of rain had the night all to themselves.

CHAPTER II.

"The bar-lesson of our task-house here . . . that we have to strive against the grievous things of life while hope remains, as if they were evil, and then when the stroke has fallen, to accept them from the hand of God, and doubt not they were good."—Martineau.

Alice Paull had gone out that evening because she could not stay in the house. She had never tried to delude herself by giving the title of "home" to the two-and-a-half story frame house with a "high" stoop on the humble avenue with the high-sounding name, into which she had removed with her family last April, yet it was all the home they had. Neighbors and neighborhood they had none. One can, if so disposed, as easily live in Brooklyn six months, or six years, without knowing so much as the names of the people next-door to her, as in the bigger city across the river. It is a common error to suppose that this sort of indifferentism is confined to the rich and worldly.

Without guessing at the truth, the Paulls were the more effectually isolated by the impression created by the household stuff transported from the vans to the two-and-a-half story house. Every article of furniture, however ingeniously muffled up, was detected and criticised by the denizens over the way, and on either side of what figured in the real estate agents' advertisement, as "that desirable cottage residence, at 363 Mendrebas avenue, between Post and Pillar streets, and combining all the advantages of town and country." There was not too much furniture for a small house, but the pieces were too large for the rooms and altogether too handsome for the vicinity—decided the spectators, standing well back in their upper chambers, not to be seen through the windows. Mrs. Gaze, at 364, settled in her mind at a glance, that the big carved buffet must be set in the back parlor. "It couldn't never no way at all, be shoved into the basement dining-room, without they tore the front of the house out." Mrs. Pryor, at 365, "wondered the new folks next door hadn't traded off that big grand piano for a small upright." She "admired to see things suitable, and that lumbering elephant of a thing would take up the front parlor."

The crowning offence was a billiard-table, to admit which a basement window had to be taken bodily from the casings. It set the stamp of disreputableness upon the whole establishment in the estimation of the steady-goers thereabouts. Such appurtenances might do for the private residences of rich New Yorkers who tampered with all sorts of soul-destructive playthings, but it was not what Mendebras avenue, where so many people owned their houses, was used to.

The Paulls kept but one "girl," Scotch by birth, fifty years old, and an inveterate stay-in-doors, except on Sunday, when she went a mile-and-a-half, clear to Williamsburgh, to attend a Scotch Presbyterian Church. Thus much was gleaned by a boy who went down on a street-car with her one Sunday morning, and saw where she got off. She did all the marketing, bringing her purchases home in a covered basket, and taking in the ice at the basement door with her own hands, never allowing a strange foot to cross the threshold, and resisting all neighborly blandishments looking towards chats over the back fence, and while sweeping the side-walk. Yet, the tale somehow got about, that the new folks ate in the back parlor, the billiard-table being devoted to the purpose for which it was made. Mrs. Keeneyse, at 365, had "hoped that it was a second-hand affair bought cheap and meant to be used for a dining-table. As it was, she hadn't a word more to say, except that times had changed and Mendebras avenue was no exception to the rule."

When the weather grew warmer, the secret of the novel scandal was soon out at the open windows. More than one passer-by on summer nights was reported to have been misled as to the respectability of the neighborhood by hearing the click of the ivory balls, and men's voices in merry conversation in the front basement.

The family-proper consisted, as was soon ascertained, of father and mother, a lad of seventeen or thereabouts, a girl somewhat younger, two boys of ten and eight, and a little girl of six. Eight souls, all told, counting in the immortal part of the Scotch "girl" —and a close fit for No. 363. True, the father who must have been a splendid figure of a man when young, was away from home for weeks at a time. They did say that he traveled for a New York concern—silk, some thought, and others, straw goods. All the family except Mrs. Paull and the Scotch girl were away in July and August. Somebody —nobody could specify who—had said that they had swell relations who owned "places" at Newport or somewhere else, and took a sight of notice of the children. The oldest boy was off at boarding-school, or, maybe, college, and the biggest girl, she went away early Monday morning and came home on Friday night, so she was most likely in a school in New York. Twice, on very stormy Fridays, she had been brought home in a bang-up private carriage.

Taking all these drawbacks into consideration, the Paulls went ill with the setting in which some reverse of fortune had placed them. The sturdy, honest pride of their neighbors did not revolt at the almost certainty that the new people had once been wealthy, and in circles of which they—the Mendebras Avenueites—knew nothing except by hearsay. Nor would the bang-up brougham have held them back from "neighboring" with the pale woman in black who was rarely seen beyond her doors by daylight, but who had been met a mile away after dark, more than once, walking fast and noticing nobody.

HIS father was one of the most prosperous men in the colony and abundantly able, had he so chosen, to give his son a thorough education and send him either to Harvard, Yale, or King's College, (Rhode Island College, afterward Brown University, was not fully established till he was thirty years old.) But his father did not so choose; such a course would have seemed to him most sinful. He employed an itinerant teacher in the long winter evenings to teach his eight boys to read, write, and cipher. Having mastered these, the Holy Scriptures and the writings of George Fox and Robert Barclay were considered as affording all knowledge that was needful or useful. Against this programme, Nathaniel, the younger, instinctively rebelled. At the age of fourteen he made the acquaintance of a young man named Giles, who was passing his college vacation in the village of East Greenwich, a short distance from his father's home. The result of his conversations with Giles about college and books led him to ask of his father better means of study; and after much hesitation his father so far yielded as to allow him to study geometry and a little Latin under a teacher named Maxwell, in East Greenwich. This taste of knowledge suggested to the lad that he devise means within his own control for procuring books, and accordingly he made toy anchors and other toys of iron. The next time the sloop took her load of wares from the forge and the mill to Newport, he went in it, and promptly sold his toys for cash. With this he proceeded to the bookstore and remarked that he wanted to "buy a book." The bookseller sharply asked, "what book?" And the boy, abashed, was unable to reply. But it happened that in the bookstore at the same time was the Rev. Ezra Styles, then pastor of the Second Church in Newport, and afterward for many years President of Yale College. He was much interested in a lad who showed such a positive but ill-defined desire for knowledge, and at once began to give him welcome advice about the choice of books. Through this kindly assistance young Nathaniel became acquainted with Locke on the Understanding and Watt's Elements of Logic, which, in connection with Euclid, formed strong, wholesome food for an acquiring and eager mind of fifteen. In his trips to Newport, he also formed the acquaintance of Lindley Murray, the future grammarian, who, although younger than himself, was being well educated and anxious to talk about books and studies. In his nineteenth year, the death of his two stepbrothers led to a lawsuit concerning the disposition of their property, of so complicated a nature that it was sent to England on appeal. His father instructed him to collect evidence and confer with the lawyers, and this induced him to purchase Jacob's Law Dictionary and diligently study it. A little later he purchased an Oxford edition of Blackstone, in four quarto volumes; then the Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, in four volumes. Further additions to his stock were made from time to time, but it was not until he moved to Coventry and built his own house, that he could fully gratify his taste for books. Then he had a library of two hundred and fifty volumes, well chosen and solid books, which had cost him no little hard-earned money and which he thoroughly studied, reading many of them over and over again—English and Roman History, Vattel and Hume, translations of Homer, Cæsar, and Horace, Butler's Analogy, Plutarch's Lives, Turenne's Memoirs, Ferguson's History of Civil Society, the Spectator, Pope, Swift, and Sterne, and others equally good.

In these days of circulating libraries and countless novels, magazines and newspapers, we are apt to forget that a good education can be obtained from a library of one hundred well-selected volumes, especially if they be obtained only by persistent effort and the sacrifice of time and money. Then they are appreciated, are pored over and thought out and read and re-read, stored away in the memory with an enduring lodgment that no easy gained and lightly-read book can secure. Such a library did Nathan. Greene slowly accumulate and ardently devour, although to the close of his life he felt conscious of the defects of his early education.

THE CRY OF THE SOUL.

COME Jesus, Redeemer, Oh Spirit divine,
Plant unfading faith in this weak heart of mine;
Inspire me with courage to walk in the road
That leads, through life's maze, to the mansions of God.

Come help me to stand when the tempest is near,
Thy arm of love 'round me, my journey shall cheer,
Shall help me pass safe o'er each dangerous way,
Through the gloom and the night to Eternity's day.

Oh come to me Jesus, be always my guest,
Come, blessed Redeemer, come honor the feast;
Oh, abide with me ever, not alone for awhile,
With joy will I greet thee, and live in thy smile.

I know how unworthy I am to be thine,
My Saviour almighty, allwise, and divine,
My Jesus, Redeemer, thy love, like the sun,
Warms the poor and the needy, of whom I am one.

I wait now thy coming, I pray not delay,
Thy presence can chase every shadow away,
I hunger, I thirst, thy communion to share,
To know thee completely, thine image to bear.

CHRISTIANITY KNOWS NO COLOR.

A SOUTHERN lady writing from Edisto, S. C., where there is much suffering among those rendered destitute by the recent floods tells the following interesting incidents:

"A friend once said to my father: 'How is it that I never see you refuse to give a beggar, come as many as will to your door? Don't you know that many are unworthy? I saw you give a man money just a few moments ago, which I know will be spent for drink.' He replied: 'I would never refuse one unless I know most positively that he was an impostor or unworthy; for in so doing I might turn away one unworthy object and dozens of worthy and needy ones.' This remark made such an impression upon me, even as a little child, that all through life I have tried to act upon that principle. God's promises are numerous and positive to his people who are willing to help their fellow-creatures in days of suffering and calamity. Now, people have often responded nobly to the suffering of the South, and I feel assured that some are still ready and willing to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. It grieves me to see these suffer; they come to me constantly for aid, but I am helpless. Some of these are my old family servants, who never knew what hard work or want meant. I was always a kind and humane owner, employed a physician and nurse for my people, visiting them myself in their houses, making their nourishment with my own hands. Besides this, I employed a minister for them and I have read God's holy Word to many a dying one. I have lived among them for nearly sixty years.

"Not very long after the war, a woman whom I had raised from childhood, had suffered from a long and severe illness. She was a great Christian, and I made it my duty to minister to her spiritual as well as temporal wants, each day took her nourishment, and in my basket I took my Bible. She had but one child—a daughter—and I think I can see the expression of that dying face now, when she asked me to come near to her bed. 'Miss,' she said, 'there is but one thing that worries me, and that is leaving my little helpless child. If you will only promise to take her and bring her up as you did me. I will die satisfied for I have long since made my peace with God. Remember if you grant this request of a poor dying sinner, God will protect and bless you and yours.' I took the child home and did for her as if she were my own, and she remained with me until I saw her married, and she is now the mother of a large family, and she often brings her little children to me and tells them she knew no other mother."

Christianity recognizes no difference in color or race. There are thousands of Christian white people who feel kindly toward their colored brothers and sisters as our correspondent states, and who are even now striving to help them in their day of affliction.

PAUL'S FOUR ANCHORS.*

THO' night be dark, yet God, my God
Is here and in command:
And sure am I when morning breaks
I shall be at the land.
And since I know that darkness is
To him as sunniest ray,
I'll cast the anchor Patience out
And wish, but wait for day.

Fierce drives the storm; but wind and waves
Within his hand are held.
And trusting to Omnipotence,
My fears are sweetly quelled.
If wrecked, I'm in his faithful grasp;
I'll trust him! tho' he slay!
So letting go the anchor Faith,
I'll wish, but wait for day.

Still seem the moments dreary, long,
I'll rest upon the Lord.
I'll muse on his Eternal years
And feast upon his Word.
His promises so rich, so great,
Are my support and stay.
I'll drop the anchor Hope ahead,
And wish and wait for day.

Oh, wisdom infinite! Oh, light
And love supreme, divine!
How can I feel one fluttering doubt
In such a hand as thine?
I'll lean on thee, my best beloved!
My heart on thy heart lay.
And casting out the anchor Love,
I'll wish and wait for day.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

THE SONG OF THE STAR.

A CHRISTMAS STORY, BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

"JOSIE'S FACE WAS ILLUMINED."

"OH, boys; you can count me out on that—all I can get goes to my mother and sisters for Christmas."

The speaker was a manly little newsboy, with good features, a clean face and bright eyes. His clothes looked neat, though they were adorned with numerous patches.

"But see here, Will. Christmas only comes once a year, and why shouldn't we fellers have our banquet as well as the silk-stockings? What would they know about things going on in the world anyway, if we newsboys didn't supply 'em with papers? All in favor of having a banquet, hold up yer hands?"

Up went a score of hands—some dirty, some clean and some speckled, but Will's hand remained down. "See here, Will, what's the reason you won't stay by us?"

The boy hesitated a moment and then said: "Boy's, its mighty close times up at our house; fried chicken and pound cake don't come our way, turkeys roost too high for us, and, and—well boys, if you must know it, about the only good thing we kids have up there, is our mother's love. See these patches! My mother put them on. See these stockings! My mother has been mending this same pair of stockings for more than a year, and she washes and irons them after I've gone to bed at night. Every stitch of mother's needle and thread is a stitch of love, and one night not long ago, I opened my eyes and saw my mother's tears dropping on the sleeve of my coat at the same time she was putting the patch on this elbow. I tell you, boys, the best thing I've got in the world is my mother and the best Christmas gift I ever had is my mother's love. If I had a million dollars, I'd give them all to my mother in return for her love. No, no, boys; no banquet for me, as long as I know my mother is starving herself, that we children may have more to eat."

"Well," replied one of the boys, "if I had a mother like that, maybe I'd feel the same way; but all we get at our house is a good licking from a drunken mother, and I'm going in for a square meal at Christmas, if I never has another."

The boys, gathered on the sidewalk by one of the parks, were suddenly startled by a cry "look out there!" and the next moment a runaway horse dashed into their midst; little Will was knocked over, and was soon carried into a neighboring drug store, all unconscious of what had happened. It was soon discovered that his arm was broken, and his body bruised in a number of places. The moment he regained consciousness and found what had occurred, he said:

"Take me to my mother; she will take care of me somehow, though this isn't exactly the kind of a Christmas gift I meant she should have. Say, boys, one of you go up to our house, and tell her easy about this; don't burst in sudden and scare her, but tell her it isn't dangerous, and—well just tell her I love her."

The boys wiped their eyes and one of them said, "this busts up our banquet, fellers; I'll go and tell Will's mother, and, say, fellers, shan't I tell her we will give our banquet money to help her out at Christmas?"

A hearty "you bet we will," was the response, as big Tom sped away to carry the news to Will's mother, while kind hands helped carry the injured boy to his home. It was a poor home into which he was borne, but everything was as neat and tidy as could be. A woman stood at the door, and it needed but one glance to know that she was the mother of Will. Poverty and hunger had failed to rob her of her beauty, and there was an air of refinement about her that told of better days and happier surroundings.

"Christmas hasn't come yet, mother," said Will, "but I have, Don't you worry; I'll come out of this all right, and we will have a good Christmas yet."

The mother kissed him tenderly as she said, "No, I will not worry, so long as I have God, and you, and Josie, and Maggie and Tot. When Christmas comes round, Will, it will be a good day whatever it brings."

"It will bring yer heaps of things, Mrs. Sandford," blurted out big Tom, "for we fellers has given up havin' a banquet, and are going to bring yer something that Will can't bring now. Don't yer worry a bit," and here the rough fellow burst into tears, and rushed out of the house.

A few more days, and then Christmas Eve came round, and a bright night it was. Will lay sleeping on the bed, his mother near by, pretending to read, but in reality using the dear old Bible as a shield to hide the tears that trickled down her cheeks. The mother was thinking, and thinking fast, too. It was only a little over thirteen years since her father had closed the door in her face and told her never to return. The man she loved was not the fashionable fop her father had selected for her, as a husband and secretly she had given her hand to the man to whom long before she had given her heart. All went well, until three years ago, when her husband died suddenly, and she found herself with no means and four children to take care of. Too proud to apply to her father for help, she struggled on as best she could, leaning hard on the God whom her mother had taught her to love.

"CHRISTMAS MORNING FOUND THEM IN A HOME OF PLENTY."

Her children were a comfort to her, for they had inherited the natural goodness of both their parents. Her tears now fell fast, for as she thought, she also listened to the voices of her two youngest children who were standing over by the window together.

"Say, Maggie, does yer see dat bright star up dere? I wonder if dat is de star what de shepherds seen! If it is, it seems to be looking right down at us. Maybe Jesus is in dat star, and if he is, he won't forget us, will he?"

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE PREY TAKEN.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Isa. 33: 23.

"Then the lame take the prey."

THE utter demolition of the Assyrian host was here predicted. Not only robust men should go forth and gather the spoils of conquest, but even men crippled of arm and crippled of foot should go out and capture much that was valuable. Their physical disadvantages should not hinder their great enrichment. So it has been in the past, so it is now, so it will be in the future. So it is in all departments. Men laboring under seemingly great disadvantages, and amid the most unfavorable circumstances, yet making grand achievements, getting great blessing for themselves, great blessing for the world, great blessing for the church, and so "the lame take the prey."

Do you know that the three great poets of the world were totally blind? Homer, Ossian, John Milton. Do you know that Mr. Prescott, who wrote that enchanting book, "The Conquest of Mexico," never saw Mexico, could not even see the paper on which he was writing? A framework across the sheet, between which, up and down, went the pen immortal. Do you know that Gambassio, the sculptor, could not see the marble before him, or the chisel with which he cut it into shapes bewitching? Do you know that Alexander Pope, whose poems will last as long as the English language, was so much of an invalid that he had to be sewed up every morning in rough canvas, in order to stand on his feet at all?

Do you know that Stuart, the celebrated painter, did much of his wonderful work under the shadow of the dungeon where he had been unjustly imprisoned for debt? Do you know that Demosthenes by almost superhuman exertion, first had to conquer the lisp of his own speech before he conquered assemblages with his eloquence? Do you know that Bacon struggled all through innumerable sicknesses, and that Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott went limping on club-foot through all their life, and that many of the great poets and painters and orators and historians and heroes of the world had something to keep them back, and pull them down, and impede their way, and cripple their physical or their intellectual movement, and yet that they pushed on and pushed up until they reached the spoils of worldly success, and amid the huzza of nations and centuries, "the lame took the prey"?

You know that a vast multitude of these men started under the disadvantage of obscure parentage. Columbus, the son of the weaver. Ferguson, the astronomer, the son of the shepherd. America the prey of the one; worlds on worlds the prey of the other. But what is true in secular directions is more true in spiritual and religious directions, and I proceed to prove it.

There are in all communities many invalids. They never know a well day. They adhere to their occupations, but they go panting along the streets with exhaustions, and at eventime they lie down on the lounge with achings beyond all medicaments. They have tried all prescriptions, they have gone through all the cures which were proclaimed infallible, and they have come now to surrender to perpetual ailments. They consider they are among many disadvantages; and when they see those who are buoyant in health pass by, they almost envy their robust frames and easy respiration.

But I have noticed among that invalid class those who have the greatest knowledge of the Bible, who are in nearest intimacy with Jesus Christ, who have the most glowing experiences of the truth, who have had the most remarkable answers to prayer, and who have most exhilarant anticipations of Heaven. The temptations which weary us who are in robust health they have conquered.

Many who are alert and athletic and swarthy, loiter in the way—the lame take the prey. Robert Hall an invalid, Edward Payson an invalid, Richard Baxter an invalid, Samuel Rutherford an invalid. This morning, when you want to call to mind those who are most Christlike, you think of some darkened room in your father's house from which there went forth an influence potent for eternity.

A step farther: Through raised letters the art of printing has been brought to the attention of the blind.

You take up the Bible for the blind, and you close your eyes, and you run your fingers over the raised letters, and you say: "Why, I never could get any information in this way. What a slow, lumbrous way of reading! God help the blind!"

And yet, I find among that class of persons, among the blind, the deaf and the dumb, the most thorough acquaintance with God's Word. Shut out from all other sources of information, no sooner does their hand touch the raised letter than they gather a prayer. Without eyes, they look off upon the kingdom of God's love. Without hearing, they catch the minstrelsy of the skies. Dumb, yet with pencil, or with irradiated countenance, they declare the glory of God.

A large audience assembled in New York at the anniversary of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and one of the visitors with chalk on the blackboard wrote this question to the pupils: "Do you not find it very hard to be deaf and dumb?" And one of the pupils took the chalk and wrote on the blackboard this sublime sentence in answer: "When the song of the angels shall burst upon our enraptured ears, we will scarce regret that our ears were never marred with earthly sounds." Oh! the brightest eyes in heaven will be those that never saw on earth. The ears most alert in heaven will be those that in this world heard neither voice of friend, nor thrum of harp, nor carol of bird, nor doxology of congregations.

A lad who had been blind from infancy was cured. The oculist operated upon the lad, and then put a very heavy bandage over the eyes, and after a few weeks had gone by, the bandage was removed, and the mother said to her child. "Willie, can you see?" He said, "Oh! mamma, is this heaven?" The contrast between the darkness before and the brightness afterward was overwhelming. And I tell you the glories of heaven will be a thousandfold brighter for those who never saw anything on earth. While many with good vision closed their eyes in eternal night, and many who had a good, artistic, and cultured ear went down into eternal discord, these afflicted ones cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he made their sorrows their advantage, and so "the lame took the prey."

In the seventh century there was a legend of St. Modobert. It was said that his mother was blind, and one day while looking at his mother he felt so sympathetic for her blindness that he rushed forward and kissed her blind eyes, and, the legend says, her vision came immediately. That was only a legend, but it is a truth, a glorious truth, that the kiss of God's eternal love has brought to many a blind eye eternal illumination.

A step farther: There are those in all communities who toil mightily for a livelihood. They have scant wages. Perhaps they are diseased, or have physical infirmities, so they are hindered from doing a continuous day's work. A city missionary finds them up the dark alley, with no fire, with thin clothing, with very coarse bread. They never ride in the street car; they cannot afford the five cents. They never see any pictures save those in the show-window on the street, from which they are often jostled, and looked at by some one who seems to say in the look, "Move on! what are you doing here looking at pictures?"

Yet many of them live on mountains of transfiguration. At their rough table he who fed the five thousand breaks the bread. They talk often of the good times that are coming. This world has no charm for them, but heaven entrances their spirit. They often divide their scant crust with some forlorn wretch who knocks at their door at night, and on the blast of the night wind, as the door opens to let them in, is heard the voice of him who said, "I was hungry and he fed me." No cohort of heaven will be too bright to transport them. By God's help they have vanquished the Assyrian host. They have divided among them the spoils. Lame, lame, yet they took the prey.

I was riding along the country road one day, and I saw a man on crutches. I overtook him. He was very old. He was going very slowly. At that rate, it would have taken him two hours to go a mile. I said, "Wouldn't you like to ride?" He said, "Thank you, I would. God bless you." When he sat beside me, he said, "You see, I am very lame and very old, but the Lord has been a good Lord to me. I have buried all my children. The Lord gave them and the Lord had a right to take them away. Blessed be his name! I was very sick, and I had no money, and my neighbors came in and took care of me, and I wanted nothing. I suffer a great deal with pain, but then I have so many mercies left. The Lord has been a good Lord to me. "And before we had got far, I was in doubt whether I was giving him a ride, or he was giving me a ride! He said, "Now, if you please, I'll get out here. Just help me down on my crutches, if you please. God bless you. Thank you, sir, Good morning. Good morning. You have been feet to the lame, sir, you have. Good morning."

Swarthy men had gone the road that day. I do not know where they came out, but every hobble of that old man was toward the shining gate. With his old crutch he had struck down many a Sennacherib of temptation which has mastered you and me. Lame, so fearfully lame, so awfully lame; but he took the prey.

A step farther: There are in all communities many orphans. During our last war and in the years immediately following, how many children at the north and south we heard say, "Oh! my father was killed in the war." Have you ever noticed—I fear you have not—how well those children have turned out? Starting under the greatest disadvantage, no orphan asylum could do for them what their father would have done had he lived. The skirmisher sat one night by the light of fagots, in the swamp, writing a letter home, when a sharpshooter's bullet ended the letter which was never folded never posted and never read. Those children came up under great disadvantage. No father to fight their way for them. Perhaps there was in the old family Bible an old yellow letter, pasted fast, which told the story of that father's long march, and how he suffered in the hospital; but they looked still further on in the Bible, and they came to the story of how God is the Father of the fatherless, and the widow's portion, and they soon took their father's place in that household. They battled the way for their mother. They came on up, and many of them have already, in the years since the war, taken positions in church and state North and South. While many of those who suffered nothing during those times have had sons go out into lives of indolence and vagabondage, these who started under so many disadvantages because they were so early bereft, these are the lame who took the prey.

A step farther: There are those who would like to do good. They say, "Oh! if I only had wealth, or if I had eloquence, or if I had high social position, how much I would accomplish for God and the Church!" I stand here to-day to tell you that you have great opportunities for usefulness.

Who built the Pyramids? The king who ordered them built? No; the plain workmen who added stone after stone and stone after stone. Who built the dikes of Holland? The government that ordered the enterprise? No; the plain workmen who carried the earth and rung their trowel on the wall. Who are those who have built these vast cities? The capitalists? No; the carpenters, the masons, the plumbers, the plasterers, the tinners, the roofers, dependent on a day's wages for a livelihood. And so in the great work of assuaging human suffering and enlightening human ignorance and halting human iniquity. In that great work, the chief part is to be done by ordinary men, with ordinary speech, in an ordinary manner, and by ordinary means.

The trouble is that in the army of Christ we all want to be captains and colonels and brigadier-generals. We are not willing to march with the rank and file and do duty with the private soldier. We want to belong to the reserve corps, and read about the battle while warming ourselves at the camp fires, or on furlough at home, our feet upon an ottoman, we sagging back into an arm-chair.

As you go down the street, you see an excavation and four or five men are working, and perhaps twenty or thirty leaning on the rail looking over at them. That is the way it is in the church of God to-day; where you find one Christian hard at work, three are fifty men watching the job.

Oh! my friends, why do you not go to work and preach the Gospel? You say, "I have no pulpit." You have. It may be the carpenter's bench, it may be the mason's wall. The robe in which you are to proclaim this Gospel may be a shoemaker's apron, But woe unto you if you preach not this Gospel somewhere, somehow! If this world is ever brought to Christ, it will be through the unanimous and long-continued efforts of men who, waiting for no special endowment, consecrate to God what they have. Among the most useless people in the world are men with ten talents, while many a one with only two talents, or no talent at all, is doing a great work, and so "the lame take the prey."

There are thousands of ministers of whom you have never heard—in log cabins at the West, in mission chapels at the East—who are warring against the legions of darkness, successfully warring. Tract-distributors, month by month undermining the citadels of sin. You do not know their going or their coming; but the foot-falls of their ministry are heard in the palaces of heaven. Who are the workers in our Sabbath-schools throughout this land to-day? Men celebrated, men brilliant, men of vast estate? For the most part, not that at all.

I have noticed that the chief characteristic of the most of those who are successful in the work is that they know their Bibles, are earnest in prayer, are anxious for the salvation of the young, and Sabbath by Sabbath are willing to sit down unobserved and tell of Christ and the resurrection. These are the humble workers who are recruiting the great army of Christian youth—not by might, not by power, not by profound argument, not by brilliant antithesis, but by the blessing of God on plain talk, and humble story, and silent tear, and anxious look. "The lame take the prey."

Oh! this work of saving the youth of our country—how few appreciate what it is! This generation tramping on to the grave—we will soon all be gone. What of the next?

An engineer on a locomotive going across the western prairies day after day, saw a little child come out in front of a cabin and wave to him; so he got in the habit of waving back to the little child, and it was the day's joy to him to see this little one come out in front of the cabin door and wave to him, while he answered back. One day the train was belated and it came on to the dusk of the evening. As the engineer stood at his post he saw by the headlight that little girl on the track, wondering why the train did not come, looking for the train, knowing nothing of her peril. A great horror seized upon the engineer. He reversed the engine. He gave it in charge of the other man on board, and then he climbed over the engine, and he came down on the cowcatcher. He said, though he had reversed the engine, it seemed as though it were going at lightning speed, faster and faster, though it was really slowing up, and with almost supernatural clutch he caught that child by the hair and lifted it up, and when the train stopped and the passengers gathered around to see what was the matter, there the old engineer lay, fainted dead away, the little child alive and in his swarthy arms." "Oh!" you say, "that was well done." But I want you to exercise some kindness and some appreciation toward those in community who are snatching the little ones from under the wheels of temptation and sin—snatching them from under thundering rail-trains of eternal disaster. You appreciate what the engineer did; why can you not appreciate the grander work done by Sabbath-school teachers and Christian workers?

One step farther: There are a great many people discouraged about getting to Heaven. At my desk in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, I am in daily receipt of numerous letters from people brought up in good families, and who had Christian parentage; but who frankly tell me that they are astray, a thousand miles from the right track, and fear their case is hopeless. My brothers, it is to you I want to preach this morning. God sent me here to-day to preach this, and he sent you here to hear this: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy, and unto our God, who will abundantly pardon." Though you may have been the worst sinner, you may become the best saint, and in the great day of judgment it will be found that "where sin abounded, grace does much more abound," and while the spoils of an everlasting kingdom are being awarded for your pursuit, it will be found that the lame took the prey. Blessed be God that we are, this Sabbath, one week nearer the obliteration of all the inequalities of this life and all its disquietudes. Years ago, on a boat on the North River, the pilot gave a very sharp ring to the bell for the boat to slow up. The engineer attended to the machinery, and then he came up with some alarm on deck to see what was the matter. He saw it was a moonlight night and there were no obstacles in the way. He went to the pilot and said, "Why did you ring the bell in that way? Why do you want to stop? there's nothing the matter?" And the pilot said to him, "There is a mist gathering on the river; don't you see that? and there is night gathering darker and darker and I can't see the way." Then the engineer looking around and seeing it was a bright moonlight, looked into the face of the pilot, and saw that he was dying, and then that he was dead. God grant that when our last moment comes we may be found at our post doing our whole duty; and when the mists of the river of death gather on our eyelids, may the good Pilot take the wheel from our hands and guide us into the calm harbor of eternal rest!

Drop the anchor, furl the sail,

THE SONG OF THE STAR.

And Tot looked at Maggie as the latter said: "Jesus loved little children, Tot, when he was on the earth, and I guess he loves them yet. That's a very bright star—it must be the one that was seen by the shepherds at Bethlehem."

"I think so, too," said Tot, "and may be Josie will hear some of dem 'good tidings' while she is out. Oh! Maggie, Jesus must love Mother; she is so good, and I think he has sent that star to tell us to look out for good news."

And where was Josie all this time? The mother thought she had gone into a neighbor's, where she frequently went, and so felt no anxiety.

Out in the streets of the big city, side by side walked plenty and poverty, wealth and wretchedness, happiness and hunger, gladness and grief. Some carried bundles in their arms, while others carried burdens in their hearts. Over all, the good God watched, and down upon all the bright star shone. But what is that? Suddenly on one of the streets the people stopped and listened. On the steps of a stoop leading up to a lighted mansion stood a little girl, who looked like a bright angel from heaven. Far above, over head, shone the bright star that Maggie and Tot had seen; it was their star and it was her star, for Josie, too, had discovered it, and somehow felt that the star that had brought "good tidings of great joy" to the shepherds on Bethlehem's plains, had come again to bring once more "good tidings." She had mounted the steps to get nearer the star, and then, all unconscious of the people, in a rich, sweet voice, she sang: —

I think, when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men;
How he called little children, as lambs to his fold;
I should like to have been with him then.

I wish that his hands had been placed on my head,
That his arms had been thrown around me; [said,
That I might have seen his kind look, when he
"Let the little ones come unto me."

As she sang, her gaze was fixed on the star, and even her hands were lifted towards it. The people looked at her; an angel had appeared in their midst—her face, her voice, her upturned eyes, her uplifted hands, held them spell-bound, until someone looking up in the direction she pointed, cried out: "See that star!" Heavenward went the gaze of the multitude, and once more there seemed to come to them a voice, saying: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." The face of Josie was illumined and even the multitude that had gathered, failed to alarm her. The star with its "good tidings" was over her head and in her heart as well. "Who are you, my child?" said a gentleman who had come up on the steps where she stood. "Please sir I am Josie Sandford." The gentleman gave a start and said, "Sandford, Josie Sandford? Pray where do you live, Josie?" She told him, and in response to other questions, told of mother, brother and sisters.

"Oh, sir; do you see the star? I am sure it has some 'good tidings' for us at our house, and I must hurry home and tell mother all about it. Good-bye."

Away sped the child until she reached her home, and then entering the room quietly, she went up to her mother and said: "Have you seen the star, mother?" Maggie and Tot cried out, "We've seen it; come, mother and look quick." The mother went quietly to the window, and there beheld a star of wonderful brightness, and as she gazed, her face took on a new light and into her heart came a great peace. The sleeping boy was awakened by the voices, and he, too, made his way to the window and looked at the star. "At evening time it shall be light."

It had come, and—something else had come, too, for steps were heard on the stairs followed by a knock on the door, on opening which, in came a company of newsboys headed by big Tom. They bore bundles and baskets, provisions and poultry, sunshine and sugar, toys and turnips, good-will and grapes, cheer and celery, and things that no one but those who had lacked for them, would ever have thought of. Big Tom was the spokesman for the happy company.

"If yer please, Mrs. Sandford," he said, "there's our banquet. We wasn't going to come until to-morrow morning, but when we got the things all together, we just couldn't wait any longer, so we've brought 'em to-night, and if it isn't too soon, ma'am, we wishes you, and Will, and Josie, and Maggie, and Tot a 'Merry Christmas,' doesn't we, boys?"

"Indeed we does!" responded the boys. The faces of that mother and her children were a sight to behold. Smiles and tears greeted the boys, and the mother and her three girls had a kiss for each of them. Then Tot said: "I knowed it, I knowed it! De star had Jesus in it, and I knowed he see Maggie and me looking up at it."

"Well, boys," said Mrs. Sandford, "you shall have your banquet, for I want you all to take Christmas dinner with us to-morrow."

"Yes, boys, you shall all take dinner with Mrs. Sandford and her children to-morrow, but it must be at the home of her parents and not here," said a gentleman who had not been noticed as he stood in the hallway.

Mrs. Sandford started as the owner of the voice entered the room, and little Josie sprang towards him at the same moment. She resembled her mother and was her namesake as well. The gentleman stretched out his arms towards Mrs. Sandford as he said to her:

"Josie, can you forgive me for the harshness with which I drove you years ago from my door? God only knows how I have suffered, and for years, I have hunted high and low for you, and have advertised time and again. But all was in vain, until to-night I saw your face and heard your voice once more, as my grandchild, Josie, stood singing on the steps and gazing at the star. In her I found you again, and oh, how your mother and I have prayed for this time to come."

Long before he had finished, the daughter was in her father's arms once more, and the children were clinging to their new-found grand-parent. The newsboys looked on in wonder, and suddenly little Tot ran to the window and then cried out—"Oh, Grandpa, the star is here yet, and it shines brighter than before," and she threw a kiss up to the star.

Christmas morning came and found them all in a home of plenty. A chair that had long stood vacant at that table, was once more filled, and near it were four other chairs for the new-found grandchildren. Was it a 'Merry Christmas," did you inquire? Just ask those newsboys who came at two o'clock if they ever had such a banquet before or since, or whether they ever saw a home in which the "Star of Bethlehem" shone with greater splendor. And over the earth the star still shines, and will continue to shine until all mankind shall yet have a "Merry Christmas."

THE "REST FOR CONVALESCENTS," WHITE PLAINS N Y.

HOMES FOR THE WORN-OUT.

This is an age of practical Christian charity. One of the many institutions of a helpful nature to be found in the vicinity of New York is the Rest for Convalescents, recently opened at White Plains. "The Rest" is a shelter for worthy Protestant women, who may be discharged from hospitals or otherwise, and who come properly recommended. They are at liberty to spend two weeks or more at the Rest while gathering strength to begin the battle of life anew.

The home is beautifully situated near White Plains, Westchester County, N.Y. It is conducted by a Board of Managers consisting of a number of ladies active in Presbyterian church circles, including Miss Kennedy, Miss Parrish, Mrs. John P. Duncan, Mrs. Howard Duffield, Mrs. Brayton Ball, Miss Butler, Miss Halsted, Mrs. Alexander Maitland, Mrs. Wetmore, Mrs. Alethea Platt, Mrs. Townsend and Mrs. McCoubrey. The Rest, together with its beautiful grounds—the whole valued at $35,000—was the gift of Miss Kennedy to the work in which she has now assumed the duties of First Directress. For some years past, her attention had been called to the fact that such an institution was greatly needed. It was her custom, every Saturday, to visit at the House of Industry, 120 West Sixteenth Street, New York, where she used to meet about fifty tired-out women, who frequently expressed a wish to have a place to which they could go and rest. For such, the Rest is open summer and winter. It was opened in June, 1893, and during the past summer over 100 women were cared for and returned to their daily life and work, greatly improved and strengthened, their hearts cheered by the knowledge that God has raised up real friends and helpers for worn workers like themselves.

There are rooms for about thirty-five inmates and although the Rest is under Presbyterian auspices, Protestants of any denomination are welcomed. The only requisites for admission are evidence of good character and a certificate from a physician. A plain, substantial table is provided and family worship is held regularly every day, all who are able being expected to attend. Those who are not in need of charity and are able to pay a nominal charge for board, do so. All find the Rest a delightful place for mental and physical recuperation and a source of spiritual blessing as well.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

KNOWING THE TIME.

S.S.Lesson for Dec. 31. Rom.13: 11-14. Golden Text, 1John 2: 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

THE new year! What will it bring forth? "Little children,it is the last hour," wrote the aged apostle (1.John 2: 18, R.V.) to whom was confided the revelation of Jesus Christ. An unready church,which has not recognized her calling, and so hath not brought forth the bride, the Lamb's wife, she hath made herself ready (Rev.19: 7), a powerless christianity, which has not produced "the manifestation of the sons" of God for which the earnest expectation of the creation waits,—accounts for a delay which seems to give the lie to the apostle's words. But we see around us a general movement, a kind of intuition on every hand, that a crisis is approaching. Political men expect it in politics, they see the tension and the strain always on the increase, public questions become more and more difficult and involved, and man's remedies only lead into deeper and deeper confusion. Real or supposed wrongs are met by men on human lines, and often the remedy turns out more disastrous than the wrong; the few may benefit, but the many suffer more. Family, social, church life is in the same state of disintegration; there are elements at work which do not, and cannot combine—all approaches a crisis, and there is a general feeling of uneasiness in "looking for those things which are coming on the earth." What does it all mean? We have no hesitation in saying that the one solution is:

"The Coming of the Lord

draweth nigh," and the times of the Gentiles which close with the end of this dispensation are nearly run out. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles till the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled." (Luke 21: 25). The apostle Paul says: "I would not, brethren, have you ignorant of this mystery, lest ye be wise in your own conceits, that a hardening in part hath befallen Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." (Rom. 11: 25). None can deny that the Jews are appearing upon the scene in the present day in a most remarkable manner. The attention of the world has been directed to them by their persecutions in Russia. It is they who hold the purse strings of the world; they exercise influence in all the cabinets of Europe; they speak every language in the known world; their trades are everywhere; and then their numbers are doubled in little more than one generation; their country, sterile and desolate for eighteen hundred years, is visited now with renewed fertility where it is being cultivated, and in the "Jewish Chronicle," (Sept. 15, 1893), one of their leading organs, a Jewish scheme for the colonization of the Holy Land is already advocated. When the Most High gave to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the children of men, he set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel. We cannot be independent of God's chosen

God has Made them His Sign set them in the midst of the peoples as testimony, with unmistakable physiognomy, with characteristics which are known in every land, with an irrepressibility of pres-

God, not man, "set the bounds of the peoples," and God himself scattered the Jews. Let us not forget that almost the whole Bible was written by Jews for Jews, and it is only by their fall that "salvation is come unto the Gentiles for to provoke them to jealousy," for "God hath not cast away

To know the time and to consider in the light of God's word, the hour in which we live and what hangs upon it, becomes us in entering upon 1894. Now that the Jews, which, for so many ages have been "a people scattered and peeled" are coming again to the front, we have the surest indication that the end of the Gentiles is at hand, and that our calling as a Gentile Church is almost at an end. It is high time to wake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Before the morning breaks the morning star appears. "I am the bright and says our coming Lord, and his promise given only "to him that overcometh" and keepeth his work unto the end, is: "I will give him the Morning Star" (Rev. 2: 26-39); he shall know the time, the Day star shall arise in his heart, and it is such overcomers that he, who himself shall rule the nations with a rod of iron, will associate with him in his government: "To him will I give authority over the nations, and he shall break them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of the potter are broken to shivers."

In all parts of the world at the present time, there is to be found a people, very few in number belonging to all nations, all denominations of Christians, of all grades of society, and all degrees of education, who not only are looking for the coming of the Lord,but who are rightly to be described as overcomers. Others are easily depressed under a little test, they are in the very heat of the furnace, but the smell of fire is not upon them, only the presence of Jesus is manifest; others may lose heart under bereavement, losses, etc., they hold all they have in trust for the coming Lord, and it can be no loss to them to surrender to him what has long been his own. They are misunderstood, but they accept this as their portion,the world knoweth them not because it knew him not, they have taken him for better, for worse; with joy they own: It is enough for the disciple to be as his Master and the servant as his Lord, they would not have another portion,they have hearkened, considered, inclined their ear; they have left their own people and their father's house, counting the cost; Having surrendered their own name and reputation, they have come under the shelter and protection of his; they are "a people for his name," the Daystar has arisen in their hearts. It is these who know the time, whose eyes are opened to see the intensity of the days in which we live. These are not afraid when they see that all the foundations are out of course, and that one cannot put confidence in anything earthly, they have learned to look up while the hearts of others are "failing them for fear," because they know that their redemption draweth nigh. Surely it is these of whom David prophesies: "Thy people are freewill offerings. In the day of thy power from the womb of the morning (when the Morning Star appears), thy youth are to thee as the dew." As the break of morning causes the dew,so the very nearness of Christ the Morning Star, developes this ready, waiting,heavenly people. While the Jews are called to inherit earthly blessings, the "people for his name," are called to be a divine, a heavenly people. The promise to the one is: "The Lord thy God shall set thee on high above all the nations of the earth;" and then all manner of temporal blessings follow, while to the other "His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue, whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by them ye might be partakers of the Divine Nature, having escaped the corruption which is in the world throught lust." The future portion of the Jew is power and prosperity on earth; the call of the overcomer is to overcome even as he overcame, and to sit down with him upon his throne as he sat down with his Father upon his throne. Like the Levite of old the overcomer has no portion or inheritance among his brethren; the Lord is his inheritance.

But the time in which we may learn, and rise up to our high vocation is fast slipping away from us. The Church of Christ, the converted throughout the world, are, by no means,"strangers and pilgrims" down here, they accept what the Master rejected, honor among men; they resist what their Master did not resist, wrongs and injuries; they have quite enough hold upon their possessions down here to say what the first Christians could not say, that what they possess is their own; and consequently when they lose it they think they are to be pitied. The coming of the Lord has not divorced them from their hold on this present evil world, they still have a name in it, a place in it, a treasure in it; they are still at home down here, they have the portion of the Jew, not that of the citizen of heaven; and, by that very fact, it is evident that the Daystar has not arisen in their hearts.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SYSTEMATIC teaching requires that Review Sunday should be devoted to the purpose for which it was set apart; otherwise the results of the study of the separate lessons may be effaced. Much may be gained by showing the relation of one lesson to another and the place an entire group occupies in the Christian system. This week the survey may take in a wider field. The lesson of December 17th, completed the seven years' course, in which the International Committee has covered the whole Bible from Genesis to Revelation. During the past seven years, teacher and scholars have dipped into the history, poetry, prophecy, gospel and doctrine of the Bible and it will be well to take stock of the results of these studies. Better than at any other time the teacher may present a sketch of the gradual and progressive development of God's revelation of himself and his will to the human race, showing how men of high spiritual development, in successive ages, groping after God and seeking answers to the questions which man has always been asking, have been granted insight into the divine mysteries. The progress should be traced from the faint and rudimentary glimmerings of the truth granted to Moses and the patriarchs, through the line of poets and prophets, to the full light when Christ came and could say, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." In short, the Bible, as the revelation of God to the world, imparted by many men of many minds, all drawing inspiration from the same source, and all aiming at the object of raising humanity Godward may well be the subject of the day's consideration.

Bible writers. One was a shepherd, two were fishermen, one a tax-collector and so on. Not the kind of men one would have expected to be employed for the purpose. The test, however, is that of experience. Mr. Beecher speaking of this peculiarity illustrated it by supposing that a great admiral wanted a chart of some difficult harbor. Robert Small offers him one that he had made with the point of a burned stick when he was a slave. The admiral rejects it with contempt. "But," says Small, "it is correct; I have been a pilot in that harbor and I know it is right. Here is a shallow place, here is an obstruction, here is a headland, here are the rocks, this way is a safe passage, deep water and clear sailing." The admiral looks at it again and he orders a cutter manned and soundings taken. He finds it is all as Small had put it and he says: "This is a good chart if a negro did make it. It is true; that is why it is good." That is why we prize the Bible. It shows the way of safety.

The Bible Message. Two gentlemen were riding together, when one asked the other, "Do you read the Bible?" "Yes." was the answer, but with the sad ending, "I get no good from it." "How is that?" was the next question. "Because," he said, "I feel that I do not love God." "That was the case with me," said the other. "I did not love God; but I kept on reading because the book told me how much God loved me and I soon began to love him."

How to understand the Bible. Spurgeon used to say the Bible was like a beautiful cavern. When you enter a cavern you inquire for a guide, who comes with his lighted flambeau. He conducts you down a considerable depth, and you find yourself in the midst of the cave. He leads you through different chambers. Here he points you to a little stream rushing from amid the rocks, and indicates its progress. The Bible is a grand series of caverns. It is our glory to have so great and wise a conductor as the Holy Spirit. He is a light shining in the midst of us to guide us.

Bible guidance. Caughey tells of a poor and illiterate young man who went to a large city where he was thrown much in the company of infidels. They ridiculed the Bible and him for studying it. They propounded many objections to the book which he was unable to answer. They proved to their own satisfaction that the Bible was a bad and useless book and the young man kept silence. Being asked if he would not give it up, he refused. "No," said he, "I know that if it is not true, as you say, I shall be a much better man for living according to its teaching and so it will be better for me in this life. And if it should be true, as I believe, it will be better for me in the next life. So I am going to stick by the Bible; for whether true or not I stand to benefit by it, in this life surely and the next probably." "You will be disappointed about the next life," persisted his tormentors, "for there is no life after this." The young man considered for a moment and for the first time gained a point in the dispute by saying, "How can I be disappointed, if, as you say, I shall not exist?"

A Blank Bible. The eminent scholar, Dr. Rogers, gives a vivid account of a remarkable dream. He thought after attending a meeting at which the Bible was ridiculed as an obsolete, antiquated, useless book, he went home and to bed. The next morning, on opening his Bible, he found to his consternation, that the pages were all blank. On going on the street, he met people complaining of the same strange event. It was evident that God, angry at his Word being despised, had withdrawn it from the world. There were many consultations as to what should he done. Everyone wanted the book restored. It was suggested that as scarcely a book existed which did not contain one or more quotations from the Bible, it might be possible to restore the entire book from isolated quotations. But alas! it was discovered that every text,every phrase which had been quoted, whether in books of theology,poetry or fiction,had been effaced.There was a blank space on every line where a quotation had once stood. It was with trembling hand that some tried to write down some passage that they remembered. They feared that the writing would fade out as soon as it was written. But, to their great joy, the writing remained. They then perceived that God left them at liberty to reconstruct the Bible, if they could,from their own memories. This discovery led to a search for Bible students. At length a great movement was organized to bring together students of all denominations, to see how much of the Bible could be reconstructed from their recollection. The dreamer was amused to see how each remembered the proof texts of his own creed. A miser contributed a missing passage from Proverbs about worldly prudence. A Quaker reminded the meeting of the passage about there being a time to keep silence; many remembered that there is a time to hate. Few remembered passages condemning their own faults, but every one kindly remembered those condemning the faults of their neighbors. Good progress was made the first day, but all mourned over the lost book and had doubts of the accuracy of the new one. The dreamer was awakened by the summer morning sun streaming through his window. He leaped from his bed to the table on which his Bible lay, and opened it with trembling hands. The words were still there, the old book was still intact. He kissed it lovingly and throwing himself on his knees thanked God that his dream had been only a dream.

THE GOSPEL IN CAPE COLONY.

The Multiform Work Among Europeans, Hindoos, Mohammedans, Jews, Kaffirs and Zulus Carried on by the Cape General Mission.

A DEEPLY interesting and significant story of Gospel work is related by Mr. Spencer Walton, the Director of the Cape General Mission in Southern Africa, who is now on a brief visit to New York. The Mission is the outcome of an effort initiated by Rev. Andrew Murray, of Wellington, Cape Colony, to reach the heterogeneous peoples who have gathered in Cape Colony and the tribes on its borders. How manifold and varied this work is, only those who have lived in the Colony can fully realize. There are first the Colonists, who are chiefly of English birth or descent; then there are the soldiers, sailors and mounted police, which the English Government maintains there for the defence of the Colony and the preservation of order; in addition, there is the horde of men of diverse nationalities whom the discovery of gold and diamonds has attracted, among whom there are five thousand Jews. Added to these are the dark races in and around the Colony, among which there are seventeen thousand Malays. They are rigid Mohammedans, but are open to Christian influences. They are the descendants of the slaves brought thither by the early Dutch settlers. At Kimberley, are the diamond mines where about thirty races, including Zulus and Kaffirs are represented among the miners. At Johannesburg, in the Transvaal, where the gold miners are, there is a still stranger collection of peoples, including Europeans, whose need of the Gospel is as great as that of the natives. At Pretoria, in the Transvaal, there is an Asiatic ingredient added to the singular medley. There is a coolie settlement outside the town, where Hindoos and Mohammedans in search of gold and precious stones, are living in squalid misery. Still farther in the Transvaal, in the neighborhood of Vryheid and Nachtmaal, are the kraals of the Zulus, standing in startling contrast to the farmhouses of the Dutch Boers. Farther east, on the borders of Gazaland, is Swaziland, the natives of which are still sunk in heathenism. Very unlike are the conditions of these various races, differing from each other in temperament, in their proclivities and in their education. From the English outcast whose vice and prodigality have driven him from a home of refinement and culture into the South African army or the mining camp, to the Zulu with his superstitious rites and ceremonies is a long step, but the brave and devoted men and women of the mission, under the leadership of Mr. Spencer Walton, are giving with utmost confidence to all, the same unfailing panacea for all human sorrow and misery—the Gospel which is still, as it was in Paul's day, to all who believe, the power of God and the wisdom of God.

MR. SPENCER WALTON.

MRS. SPENCER WALTON.

The Rev. Andrew Murray, who is the author of "The Children for Christ, Abide in Christ" and other works well known and widely circulated in this country, was not the kind of man to remain unmoved amid such need as existed in and around the colony. He worked hard with such help as he colony afforded to give the Gospel to the people, but the means were awfully inadequate to the work. Twelve years ago he visited England, earnestly desiring to enlist laborers for his far-off harvest-field, but with little practical result. The Macedonian cry he then uttered had, however, not been unheard. To some earnest workers it appealed strongly, but for the time the way was not plain. Mr. Spencer Walton, whose portrait, with that of his devoted wife, appears on this page, was among the number. He was at that time engaged in business and devoting his evenings and Sundays to evangelistic work in London and the neighborhood. In 1888, however, a great religious convention was held at Wakefield, at which many who were present consecrated themselves afresh to Christ's service. There was much searching of heart, and passionate longing to spend and be spent in the cause of Christ. The result was a seeking of new opportunities for service and a resolve, if God opened the way, to enter upon them, trusting him to provide the means of support. Among those thus moved by the Holy Spirit were some who, six years before, had heard Andrew Murray's urgent appeal for help. They now determined to respond and after waiting on God in prayer for guidance, the Cape General Mission was organized with Rev. Andrew Murray as President and Mr. Spencer Walton as Director. A home committe was formed, on an economical basis. The members and officers undertook to transact the business and correspondence at their own homes and thus the expense of general offices in London with their attendant staff was avoided. Mr. Walton had previously visited Capetown and held evangelistic services. The result justified the hope that God would own and bless the effort put forth. There had been a most blessed and successful revival in Capetown. The largest buildings in the city had proved too small to accommodate the eager seekers and the movement had spread through the colony. Mr. Walton, on his return, told the story of the work in several London churches, among others in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, at a meeting over which the late Pastor Spurgeon presided. Mr. Spurgeon rejoiced at the news, gave the mission his hearty commendation, and proved to the day of his death a sincere, practical friend of the work. After a short tour through England, explaining and describing the necessities and the prospects of the new mission field, Mr. Walton returned to the Colony with six consecrated helpers who had volunteered for service in that land. During the four years that have since elapsed, two of the little band have died in harness, one abandoned the work and the remaining four have struggled on. Their reports of success, of new opportunities that were opening reached the mother country, and aroused new interest. Other earnest Christians volunteered and went out to recruit the depleted band, until now there are fifty laborers in the field and eight more are preparing to join them.

Among the tangible results of the work are two Soldiers' Homes, one at Capetown and the other at Wynburg, where the soldiers find comfort, religious teaching, friendly counsel and a better resort than the canteen or the local saloons, where previously they had passed the hours when they were off duty. Another institution, founded by the mission, which has been much appreciated and much blessed, is a Sailors' Rest conducted on similar principles to the Soldiers' Homes. A large Hall has also been erected, in which religious services are held on Sunday evenings. A Deaconesses Home and a training school for nurses have been established and mission stations secured for the work among the natives.

The success that has attended every department of the Mission's work is remarkable. One of the most hopeful of far-reaching results is that in the "Compounds" at the Diamond mines. As many as seven thousand natives are usually gathered in these compounds. They belong, as we have said, to many races and come from their distant kraals to work a few months at the mines. To avoid subjecting them to temptations to drink and gamble and steal the precious stones, they are kept close prisoners during their term of service in a space surrounded by a high stockade roofed over with wire netting. These spaces adjoin the mines and are called "compounds." The netting roof is put there to prevent their inserting a diamond in an orange or some other fruit and tossing it over the stockade to a confederate outside. A picture taken from one of Mr. Walton's photographs of a group of miners in a compound appears on this page. The compounds are kept scrupulously clean, with all conveniences for cooking and other necessaries. A hospital for the sick connects with them. The missionary is freely admitted to the compounds and holds services on Sunday, when work at the mines is suspended. Some of the people refuse to attend preferring to engage in games, or to lie around and smoke, but a large number listen to the missionary and several genuine conversions have taken place. When the men leave the compounds at the end of their term of service, to carry their wages to their distant kraals, not a few of them take with them the precious knowledge of Christ and a Bible in their own language which they can read to their people at home.

The mission has secured the services of Titus, a Zulu exangelist, for its work among men of that race. His head-quarters are at the house of a friendly Dutch farmer who is a Christian man, in thorough sympaihy with the Mission's work and ever ready to help Titus in reaching his people. In Swaziland the work is slow; the people are indifferent, but sixty thousand are living there in heathenism and the mission is hoping and praying that the good seed will soon begin to bear fruit. At Johannesburg four missionaries are laboring and a hall has been built in which services are regularly held and much good has been done. At Pretoria also the most encouraging prospects are in sight. When Mr. Murray and Mr. Walton visited the place some two years ago and described the work they were about to begin they were warmly welcomed and excellent buildings at nominal rent were placed at their disposal for meetings and residences for missionaries. In Basutoland also three stations have been established each with convenient quarters for the work.

A SCENE IN A COMPOUND AT THE DIAMOND MINES, NEAR KIMBERLEY, SOUTH AFRICA.
From a photograph secured by Mr. Spencer Walton

Although the Cape General Mission is undenominational, it cheerfully gives assistance to denominational Missionary effort in fields adjacent to its own. An instance of this fraternal spirit is seen in Pondoland, which is one of the most benighted districts of Southern Africa. On a recent visit to the country Mr. Walton found the Wesleyan Missionaries lamenting the inadequacy of their force, and with the consent of the General Council he offered them assistance. Four of the General Mission's best workers went into Pondoland and commenced work under the direction of the Wesleyan Society. After a year's training at the station they will occupy two stations on the river St. John.

The mission's income has been furnished thus far by freewill offerings from Christian people. No appeal for funds has been made. The needs of the time are laid before God in prayer and the funds have come. The new opening in Pondoland, an extention of the work in Swaziland and the mission station at Transkei involving a total expenditure of about $3,000 are now the burden of prayers. The missionaries believe that God would not have opened these doors to them if he did not intend to provide the means.

Christmas

IT was a winter month that God chose for his Son's nativity. Had it been the month of May—that is the season of blossoms. Had he been born in the month of June—that is the season of roses. Had he been born in the month of July—that is the season of great harvests. Had he been born in the month of September—that is the season of ripe orchards. Had he been born in the month of October—that is the season of upholstered forests. But he was born in a winter month.

It was in closing December that he was born, to show that this is a Christ for people in sharp blast, for people under clouded sky, for people with frosted hopes, for people with thermometer below zero. That is the reason he is so often found among the destitute. You can find him on any night coming off the moors. You can see him any night coming through the dark lanes of the city. You can see him putting his hand under the fainting head in the pauper's cabin. He remembers how the wind whistled around the caravansary in Bethlehem that December night, and he is in sympathy with all those who in their poverty hear the shutters clatter on a cold night. He was born among the sheep, and the cattle, and the horses, and the camels, in order that he might be an alleviating influence to the whole animal creation. Hath the Christ who said, "Behold the fowls of the air," himself never beheld the outrages heaped upon the brute creation which cannot articulate its grief? This Christ came not only to lift the human race out of its trouble, but to lift out of pang and hardship the animal creation. The first bleat of the lamb of God heard amid the tired flocks of the Bethlehem shepherds.

We want a December Christ, not a Christ for fair weather, but a Christ for dark days clouded with sickness, and chilling with disappointment, and suffocating with bereavement, and terrific with wide-open graves. Not a spring-time Christ, not a summer Christ, not an autumnal Christ, This suffering and struggling world needs to be hushed, and soothed, and rocked, and lullabied in the arms of sympathetic Omnipotence. No mother ever with more tenderness put her foot on the rocker of the cradle of a sick child than Christ comes down to us, to this invalid world, and he rocks it into placidity and quietness as he says: "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you."

MARTYRS OF TOIL.

THE editorial and reportorial staffs of enterprising newspapers have again and again been the coffin of editors and reporters and compositors. So, while we rejoice in the fact that we get all the news, let us be fully appreciative of the toils and exposures by which they are gathered. But all occupations have toils enough. Multitudes make a failure of life under the delusion that if they can get at something else it will be easier. They cross over and find as many disadvantages or worriments in the new occupation as in the old. Then they cross to something else and they spend most of their life on the ferry between vocations. Our young people might as well know first as last that success in any calling demands drudgery, sacrifice, tug and push. If you find yourself in the wrong business, of course, leave it; but do not leave it because your present duties are onerous and exhausting. We are all under the old curse,"by the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread." But by cheerful application to duty we may turn that which was a grinding anathema into a beautiful benediction, so that the people who work the hardest are generally the happiest. But a mechanic whose work blisters his hands would like to have the work of a student. He becomes a student and now he has just as many blisters as he had then, but they are on the brain. The weaver's foot gets tired swinging the shuttle and he becomes a an artist, and now the pressure is on the eye and the hand. Harnessed we must be to a load, and the collar sometimes will gall and the girth oppress and the buckles will cut. But patience, all ye men of business, all ye members of professions, all ye disciples of mechanism. Not long shall be the strain. Life seems long at the start; it does not seem so long at the last. The day seems long at the sunrise; not so long at noon; very short at the sunset. At twenty-five years of age life seems almost interminable; at fifty years of age it is a handbreadth; at seventy it is a tale that is told. We shall all soon be through with it. You will soon sell your last bill of goods, make your last prescription for the sick, make the last attorney's plea, rear the last wall,bind the last book,set up the last "em" of type,travel your last journey,speak your last word. Then, if you are Christians, will come the saint's everlasting rest—not the rest of eternal sluggards, not the rest of immortal stolidity, not the rest of celestial donothings, not a hanging about the temples and palaces of heaven in unending loaferdom; but the rest of all our transformed faculties in full play without lassitude or limit or fatigue.

A MEAN STREAK.

THE jealousies of men toward those engaged in the same kind of work are often made evident. So many people are disposed to take honors bestowed on others as indignities heaped upon themselves. Praise of others is taken as dispraise of them. The meanest things in our world are its envies and jealousies. Their common table fare is reputations roasted, reputations fried, reputations scolloped, reputations canned. The wall of a home, the communion table of a church, the slab of a graveyard, are no defense. Ministers pursuing ministers, lawyers pursuing lawyers, doctors pursuing doctors, merchants pursuing merchants, Arctic explorers pursuing Arctic explorers. How seldom it is you find men in an occupation or profession speaking well of others in the same occupation or profession. When we find exceptions to the rule, as we often do, how refreshing to head and heart. Surely the world is large enough for all, and if we find in our souls anything like this despicable passion of which I speak, let us turn against it our indignation, and ask Almighty God to help us crush the cobra. It used to seem to me that Solomon had got the wrong word and needed a milder substantive than the one he employed when he said in his proverbs, "Jealousy is the rage of a man." As I have seen the battle of life go on and hundreds of men and women persecuted and driven to the wall, and belied merely because they had more virtue or more brain, or more beauty, or more success than others,the attack more and more virulent and persistent and vehement as the years go on, the dagger struck at them between the iron wicket of the sepulchre even after they had gone down into their winding sheets, and showing itself months and years after their decease, I have said, "Solomon was right." Had he chosen a softer word he would have chosen the wrong word: "Jealousy is the rage of a man."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. L. Laclede, Montreal. What is the duty on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums to Canadian subscribers?

We have just concluded an arrangement whereby we prepay the duty and deliver our premiums free to subscribers in all parts of Canada.

Miss Susan M. Sturges, Mansfield, O.: Can you tell me where the Christmas song for children which begins as follows, can be found:

> Welcome, welcome is this Christmas morn,
> For we love the day our King was born,
> And we are going, led by his hand,
> Up to the Christmas land.

Possibly some of our readers can supply the information.

E. H. Dumeston, Union, Iowa. It was stated by a keeper of ostriches at the World's Fair that the ostrich hatches its eggs as other fowls do. How does that affect the statement in Job 39: 13-17?

The nest of the ostrich is a hollow scooped in the sand, but the ostrich does not lay all her eggs in the nest. Several are always outside left carelessly or by design where they may be destroyed by a beast or the foot of a passer-by. The general expressions in Job are confirmed by the Arab saying current to this day, "Stupid as an ostrich."

M. S. Buckley, Fort Smith, Ark. Did Christ organize his Church or was it organized by the Apostles after his ascension?

Christ's conception of his people was as a kingdom, although twice in the Gospel of Matthew (16: 18; and 18: 17), he is represented as using the word "church." Clearly, he did no organizing work. That was done later by the Apostles and their successors. There idea apparently was of a company of saved believers who should keep alive the doctrines of Christianity and propagate the Gospel until Christ should come again and set up his kingdom on the earth.

Mrs. Lou Haas, Mount Vernon, Ind.: What does the word hell mean in the Greek and Hebrew languages?

Hell is derived from the Saxon word "helan," (the "covered or invisible place,") the habitation of those who have gone to the world of spirits. The Hebrew terms are "Sheol," ("state of the dead," or disembodied spirits) used in the Old Testament, and "Gehenna," (the place of the infernal regions) used in the New Testament, and still used literally in the same sense by Mohammedans. The Greek is "Hades" (the invisible place or region).

Mrs. C. C. Robinson, Wilton, N. J.: Does posture in prayer add anything to or detract from our devotion? In some churches all stand, in others all sit, in others all kneel. Some who are very sick think that, in order to pray, they must get upon their knees. Can we not pray with as true devotion sitting or walking or reclining?

Mere formal posture is immaterial. The Lord regards the sincerity of the heart alone. There is, however, a natural attitude of reverence which the individual unconsciously assumes—the head bowed and the hands folded in appeal when addressing Deity. This reverential attitude may be assumed whether standing, sitting, or kneeling. We should think that no one, capable of uttering a prayer, could assume any other than an attitude of devout supplication, yet a soldier may pray acceptably on the battlefield, a sailor in the rigging, a worker at his machine.

J. H., Hot Springs, Ark. What is your advice concerning a young man whom the church calls to preach, but who, through fear and timidity, feels his incapability to perform the duties?

Many men who have become famous orators, were at the outset of their career afflicted with nervousness—the result of a condition similar to that described by our correspondent. The celebrated John B. Gough, one of the finest platform speakers of modern times,used to say that his timidity at first was such that he was almost disposed to abandon the attempt to speak in public. In the life of John Knox, the great Scottish divine, it is related that he was greatly retarded, while a young man, from public preaching, by timidity and a sense of unworthiness. In a great spiritual crisis, a minister who knew Knox's failing, as well as his sincerity, called upon him to stand up and then delivered a powerful exhortation, denouncing the sin of holding back the message of the Gospel which he was divinely charged to deliver. After that event Knox never hesitated to preach. The young man referred to by our correspondent must summon courage to take the decisive step and speak out for Christ. He will be astonished to find how quickly his timidity will disappear.

Subscriber, Martinsburg, Pa. Ought a regularly ordained minister of the Gospel, or his ordained elders and deacons, to engage in so-called innocent games?

There are,as Paul remarked,many things that are lawful, but not expedient. It would certainly detract from the influence of a pastor to be found indulging in certain frivolous amusements which,however innocent in themselves, are undignified for one of his eminent calling. But it should be remembered that preachers, like other folks, need exercise to keep body healthy and mind clear, and to be fitted for the best service. It would be well for congregations to remember this.

Subscriber, Hillsboro, Oreg. 1. On what passage of the Bible do pædo-baptists rely for their authority to baptize by sprinkling? 2. Why did Christ eat the Passover with the disciples only? 3. Where can I get a book treating of the different modes of baptism and the basis for them?

1. On such passages as compare the baptism of water with the baptism of the Holy Spirit, as Acts 1: 5; Mark 1: 9. Also on passages referring to sprinkling for cleansing,as Isa. 52: 15; Ezek. 36: 25, and on such passages as Christ's remark to Peter. (John 13: 10.) 2. He would naturally wish to eat it with his nearest friends. The meal was usually eaten by small groups, not by large companies together. 3. Any good encyclopedia gives them, M'Clintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia does so fully on both sides.

Fannie W. Ball, Irvington, N. J. Is it known positively who were the authors of the books of Samuel, Kings, Ecclesiastes, Daniel, Malachi and Hebrews?

At this date it is impossible to obtain absolute proof of authorship in the case of any of the books mentioned. There have been many disputes among Biblical scholars on the subject. Many, perhaps a majority, think that Daniel and Malachi wrote the books that bear their names,and that Samuel probably commenced the books of Samuel and Kings, which were continued after his death by the national chroniclers of the time and were finally completed and edited by Ezra. It is improbable that Solomon wrote Ecclesiastes, as the book contains words and phrases not in use in his time. The word "son" in the first verse would, according to Jewish custom, apply to any descendant of "David, king in Jerusalem." The literary style of the Epistle to the Hebrews is so different from the style of Paul's epistles,that it is generally ascribed to some author now unknown,although some scholars think Paul may have written it.

J. D., Cowan, Tenn. 1. What is usury? 2. Can a man who is employed on a railroad and has to work Sundays be a consistent Christian if he is really desirous of avoiding Sunday work, but is obliged to do it to earn a livelihood?

1. A simple and general definition is, charging a higher rate of interest for a loan than would be charged if the borrower were not in urgent need. If the lender takes advantage of the borrower's necessity to exact a rate higher than the legal one, he is taking usury. Whether the terms of a loan are or are not usury does not depend on the rate charged, as there are circumstance which justify a higher rate,as when the lender suffers inconvenience or loss in lending the money, or the borrower expects to make a large profit through the loan, and offers a proportion of the profit to the lender. 2. The man's own conscience must be his guide in the matter. The Apostle Paul wrote, "let no man judge you in respect of the Sabbath." We think, however,that a man who desires to lead a consistent Christian life will make strenuous efforts to earn a living in some way where he is not required to work on Sundays,even if he has to make a sacrifice of income to do so.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE ENGLISH COAL STRIKE.

SELDOM has a struggle between capital and labor entailed suffering so dire and widespread as that which has reigned for four months in the coal districts of England. It has now been happily settled by the friendly intervention of the Government, and on this page we give a picture of the final scene, when Lord Roseberry read to the assembled representatives of the opposing interests the terms of settlement. Early in August last, the mine-owners gave notice that they would reduce wages by one quarter from the standard scale of 1888,on which there had been a gradual advance of forty per cent. The miners refused to submit,and as both sides were determined, the mines were closed and three hundred thousand men were out of work. From that time until the end of November, the suffering of the men and their families almost passes description. Nothing but the liberality of the English people saved large numbers from dying of starvation. Other classes suffered with them. Many of the store-keepers who supplied them with food and clothing have been absolutely ruined,and all have suffered heavy loss. The price of coal during the cessation of mining, went up to eleven dollars a ton,and the poorer classes all through the country,were unable to buy it. All industries were paralyzed,especially the iron trade,and the works had to be closed. The number of men thrown out of employment, directly and indirectly by the strike was over a million, and the direct loss to the mine-owners and their employees was over sixty million dollars. There appeared no prospect of an end of the struggle in November, and the calamity was becoming one of national concern. The heartless mine-owners still insisted on the sweeping reduction in wages, and the men were as determined as ever not to work at starvation rates. In the emergency, Mr. Gladstone wrote to the representatives of both parties and asked them to appoint delegates to meet in conference. He suggested Lord Rosebery as the chairman, as both parties had a high respect for him. The invitation was accepted and in one day a settlement was effected. The mine-owners agreed to pay the old rate of wages for two months, if the men would go back to work at once and during that period a Board of Conciliation should agree on a proper rate of wages for the future. It may be hoped that when the end of the two months arrives, there will be no renewal of the struggle which has caused so much loss and suffering. Both sides have reason to dread further conflict and possibly the pressure of the people, who have suffered indirectly, may restrain the mine-owners in persisting in their greedy and cruel policy. The whole country has learned more clearly than ever before the truth of the Apostolic warning that the wrong-doing of any class is the concern of all. No man liveth to himself and no one dieth to himself. (Rom. 14: 7).

Swallowed by the Sea.

A press dispatch from Galveston, Texas, states that the sea is making extensive inroads in that city. The part affected reaches from Fiftieth St. on the west to First St. on the east. It is said that the value of the property already swept away aggregates $100,000. The erosion is attributed by the United States engineers, to the extension of the south jetty far out into the Gulf,which has diverted the coast current from its former course. In one place the land has been eaten away for more than fifty yards inland, and at another the waters have forced themselves more than two hundred yards inland, sweeping away sand to the depth of five feet, and threatening the destruction of the electric car track. It is the opinion of experienced engineers that the erosion will not be remedied unless a sea-wall is constructed from Fiftieth Street to connect with the south jetty, at least a mile from shore. So far twenty houses have been tumbled into the sea and at least fifteen blocks of valuable building property swept away. A man would be thought very foolish who spent his money in erecting a valuable house on the threatened land. Yet, those who give their time to wordly pursuits and set their affections on worldly things are acting quite as foolishly with the risk of infinitely greater loss. (Prov. 23: 5.)

A Test for Mixed Goods.

Dealers in dry goods are indebted to a discovery of a chemist from Germany for a simple means of ascertaining whether a fabric purporting to be all wool or all silk contains any mixture of cotton, flax or other vegetable product. A piece of the stuff to be examined, say about three inches square, is, after careful cleaning, plunged into strong sulphuric acid, water being afterward added, and the whole boiled. In about five minutes the fluid is poured into a clean vessel and made strongly alkaline by saturation with caustic soda, then adding a few drops of dissolved orchil. If the color of the orchil is precipitated there is vegetable mixture and less than one per cent. is sufficient to cause this result. In testing goods alleged to be silk the sample is plunged into hydrochloric acid, the fibre of silk being very soluble in such acid. Wool and cotton, however, are not affected by the acid and if any part of the fabric remains after the application of the acid, it is certain that the remains must be cotton or wool. We are taught in God's word that an analogous process takes place as to character; but in that case the result is the reverse of that in the fabric. When trial has done its appointed work on the Christian it is the gold and not the dross that is left. (Job 23: 10.)

How a Ship was Lost.

The treasury department received through the custom house of New London a few days ago, the report of a wreck. It was that of a three masted schooner which ran ashore on the coast of Long Island during the recent storm. Her captain assigns a strange cause for the wreck. He says that he had no suspicion that his compass was not working accurately until the storm broke upon him. He went to the wheel himself and carefully followed his chart believing that he would ride the storm safely. He was astonished when the man at the lookout reported the breakers ahead. He knew then that he had been deceived by his compass, and on examining it closely he found that a steel spike projected almost imperceptibly from its side. The speck of steel caused the needle to deflect and to that fact he attributed the loss of his ship. Many a human wreck has resulted from an analogous cause. The conscience with which God endowed man to be his guide, is often deflected from the right course by some strong propensity, or some sinful desire and does not do its duty. (Titus 1: 15.)

A Lost Parentage.

A remarkable story has been elicited by inquiries as to the parentage of a child in the Government school for Indians at Pierre, S. D. The mother of the child turns out to be a white woman. It appears that in the year 1849 a marauding band of Sioux attacked a caravan on the southern border of Wyoming. The men in the caravan made a brave resistance which exasperated the Sioux, who were intent on robbery. The Indians outnumbered the whites, but the latter maintained the fight till nightfall and then made good their retreat into a gulch. Before day break the next morning the Sioux gained a position commanding the gulch and killed, as they supposed, every person in the caravan. When they looted the wagons after dawn they found several women in them who were all dead, but with one of them there was a little girl of two years old alive and unhurt. The Sioux took her away with them and she was reared by a squaw. She grew up in ignorance of her race, and did not know of the massacre until she had attained womanhood, and was married to an Indian. Among the booty of the caravan which was preserved were several letters and articles which might have furnished clues to the woman's parentage, but she took no interest in them. Recently offers were made to her for an investigation with a view of finding her relatives, but she declined them. She had lived an Indian life for over forty years, she said, and did not desire any other life. The same indifference is often encountered by Christian workers who try to lead the captives of Satan to realize that they may become the sons of God and induce them to live after the spirit and not after the flesh. (Rom. 8:14-17.)

THE ENGLISH COAL STRIKE—LORD ROSEBERY READING THE TERMS OF SETTLEMENT.

Amateur Repairs.

The experience of a New York man in trying to save a little money is quoted by a daily journal as an an amusing illustration of foolish economy. The man said to a reporter: "In my own room at home, I had for a long time a chair that I was accustomed to sit in daily. In the course of time this chair began to get a little rickety, but I didn't want to spend the money that it would have cost to have it repaired, and so I drove in a couple of nails where they seemed to be needed and let it go at that. These held it for a while, and when they began to work loose I used to give them a gentle whack now and then with a hammer, but the chair kept on getting more and more rickety, and finally it got so that I had to drive the nails in ever day before I sat down in it. I suppose I must have forgotten them the other day, for when I sat down the old chair collapsed altogether, beyond the possibility of repair. I am now convinced that it would have been truer economy to have had it repaired in the regular way by a man who makes a business of it, instead of tinkering at it myself." The same conviction would save many people from disappointment if they would apply it to their spiritual concerns. Mere moral reformation is never efficacious. The only sure way of beginning a new life is to take the heart to Christ and claim his promise to renew it wholly. (Ezek. 11: 19, 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Arrangements have been for the present made to ship all Premiums to "Christian Herald" subscribers Immediately on receipt of subscription, thus assuring the prompt arrival of the Premiums for those who wish to use them as Holiday presents.

Services have been commenced in Providence, R. I., preparatory to the Moody campaign, which will begin on the first day of the new year.

Questions are being asked about the week of prayer. It always follows the first Sunday in January which brings it in 1894 later than usual. It will be January 7-14.

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew has added a new philanthropic agency to its departments in Chicago by opening a wood-yard, lodging house and restaurant for needy men.

Rev. A. H. Bradford, D. D., of Montclair, N. J., has been elected President of the American Institue of Christian Philosophy in succession to the late Dr. C. F. Deems.

Subscribers in Canada will be glad to learn that they have no customs duty or express charges to pay on the premiums of the Christian Herald. Arrangements have been made by which all charges are prepaid by us at this end of the line.

Tello D'Apery, to whom some of our readers sent contributions last Christmas for his Christmas tree and to help clothe and shoe his barefoot boy friends, would be glad of help of the same kind this year. His address now is 59 West 24th street, New York. During the past year he has furnished shoes and stockings to over four thousand children.

Commissioner Hubbell of the New York Board of Education is organizing an Anti-Cigarette League among the boys of the public schools of the city. He was so horrified by the result of his investigations as to the extent and effects of the habit, that he initiated the movement and is pressing it with all his energy. He gives short talks to the boys and induces them to sign a pledge promising to abandon the habit of smoking cigarettes.

Dr. L.W. Munhall has been holding very successful services at Kingston, N.Y. The Wurtz Street Presbyterian Church has been crowded daily at three services and more than six hundred persons made profession of faith. On Tuesday, Dec. 5, seventy-five houses of business were closed voluntarily to give the employees an opportunity of attending the meetings.

The annual report of the Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C. has been issued. The record of work done shows that the Mission still maintains its position as the model Mission of the country. Its income last year was $4,335,all of which was expended in its work by the Gospel Wagon, and the eight branch missions established in various parts of the city. More than four thousand hungry men were fed during the year. At the Gospel meetings no less than 924 professed conversion.

Pastors interested in Foreign Missionary work will be glad to learn that popular lectures on Persia and the Caucasus are being delivered by Rev. P. Z. Easton, the eminent missionary, whose long and devoted labors in those regions have made his name famous throughout Christendom. Mr. Easton who was arrested more than once for preaching, has a thrilling story to tell. One of his lectures has a special interest for American audiences as it shows what has been done in modern Persia by the alliance of the twin evils which are now threatening society in this country—pantheism in religion and anarchism in social life. Mr. Easton's address until he returns to Persia,is 12 Perry St., N. Y.

Gipsy Smith has been holding large meetings in Glasgow Free Churches. All through the week the building was quite full. An average of nearly thirty persons nightly remained to the inquiry meeting, a large proportion of whom made profession of faith.

Mrs. Charlotte Draper (Sister Charlotte), who has opened a home for homeless and destitute women at 213 West 24th st., New York, will be glad to receive contributions of money, clothing, coal, or provisions before Christmas day that she may appropriately celebrate the season by clothing and feeding as many of the poor women as possible.

Rev. W. J. Judd of Denver, Colo., who is now in New York on a visit reports a remarkable revival of religious interest throughout Colorado and other western states. In Denver Christian effort is being much blessed especially at the missions. Mr. Uzell and Dean Peck are greatly cheered by the number of the converts.

Mr. Charles A. Dana, writing of his recent tour in Palestine in McClure's Magazine, says that he was informed by a Jewish Rabbi that the completion of the railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem was regarded by the Jews as an augury of their speedy return to their own land. The Hebrew word translated "swift beasts" in Isa. 66:20, the Rabbi said, means literally a swaying furnace, an epithet which would naturally be applied to a locomotive by one who saw it in prophetic vision.

Extraordinary success has attended the special Evangelistic meetings at Detroit, Mich., conducted by Dr. Chapman and Peter Billhorn. At the close of the first week, the Free Press said that the attendance and the interest aroused had been phenomenal. Three meeting a day were being held and no building in the city was large enough to hold the crowds which came. On Wednesday, December 6th, Dr. Chapman announced meetings for business people and hundred of places of business, including several saloons, closed at three o'clock and their employees filled the Auditorium at the afternoon and evening services.

HEAVEN'S BEGINNING.

A Sermon delivered by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D., at the First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga. Text: John 14: 3, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself: that where I am ye may be also."

THESE were the comforting words which Jesus spoke to his disciples just before his crucifixion. To those who had journeyed with him through the years of his earthly ministry, and who had received his saving grace and experienced the blessedness of the closest communion with him, he was the dearest object in the universe. The thought of separation from him was almost unendurable. It extinguished their fondest hopes and filled their hearts with the loneliest anguish. As his presence had made their highest joy, the loss of it would make their bitterest grief. Knowing this, loving them with the tenderest affection, and moved with the profoundest pity for their sorrow, he assured them that he would provide for the gratification of their supreme desire. "I will come again and receive you unto myself: that where I am ye may be also."

An impressive feature of divine revelation is the lack of particularity in reference to the future state. It gives us only the outlines of the great unseen. It assures us that another and an endless state of being will succeed the present. It teaches us that on the threshold of that other life there is a judgment, and that in that judgment there is a separation of the righteous from the wicked, the former going away into everlasting blessedness, and the latter into everlasting punishment. It tells us that the presence and love of Christ will make the eternal felicity of one class, and the absence of it the eternal wretchedness of the other. These are the eternal verities which revelation has placed beyond the realm of doubt and speculation. These are the outlines of the world to come. As to what lies between them we are at liberty to exercise our reason and imagination.

Men who not only believe heaven to be a reality, but cherish the hope that it will be their final and eternal home, can scarcely avoid discussing many questions about it upon which revelation is silent. They desire to know where heaven is. Is it one of the larger planets of our solar system? Is it in the dim far-off Milky Way? Or is it the great central orb of the universe? They desire to know what heaven is. What does it look like? What object within the range of mortal ken does it resemble? What shall we do in heaven; what undertakings shall engage our enlarged and unfettered faculties? What will come in to satisfy our desire and need of activity when we are forever beyond the realm of earthly pursuits? With whom shall we keep company there? What language shall we speak? What music shall we sing? What raiment shall we wear? How much of what we know and feel and enjoy in this life can we carry over into that other life? We cannot take our houses and lands and money. Our sensuous pleasures, our social distinctions and our political offices and honors must be left behind. But may we carry with us the innocent loves and pure friendships which we cherish here? Will the genius and knowledge and skill of the painter, and of the musician, and of the poet, and of the orator be transferred to the next life and the next world?

The absence of light upon these subjects does not distress the intelligent Christian. Having Christ as his everlasting portion and Companion, he is confident that no element of blessedness will be left out of his heavenly inheritance. If we have received Christ as our Saviour; if we have seen him as our substitute under divine law, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree, if we have felt the transforming power of his grace making us new creatures in him; if we have received the spirit of adoption, and as loving, confiding children lean on his breast, look up into his sweet benignant face and bask in his smile; we realize that heaven is simply to be with him forever. "Where I am there ye may be also." We are with him here and now, but in the next life we shall be with him in a deeper and larger sense. There we shall have a clearer sight of him, a closer communion with him, and a more perfect knowledge of every attribute of his being, and of every element of his history and work, than it is possible for us to have in this life, where, even in our moments of highest exaltation and rapture, we see only "through a glass darkly."

There is much in our hymnology that will mislead if we are not intelligent readers of the Bible. We sing of "going to Heaven when we die," as if it were a foreign realm and in no way connected with the present world and the present life—as if it were a distant port to which we set sail after the journey of this life is over. All this is misconception. Heaven is simply the unfolding and enlargement of the life which we now have in Christ. The new and everlasting life begins with regeneration, repentance and faith. Heaven is that part of it which comes after death. That will be the best part of it, because then it will be a life of absolute harmony and communion with Christ. Unfettered by flesh and freed from sin, there will be nothing to dim the soul's vision of Him whom it loves supremely, and nothing to prevent the most intimate and perfect fellowship with him.

The point I wish to emphasize is, that the heavenly life is a continuation of the present Christian life. It is a life begun not in the next world, but in this world. Jesus said, "The kingdom of Heaven is within you." It is within us in the seed form. After death we shall have that kingdom within us in full development.

When you sing, "I want to go to Heaven when I die," you give expression to a desire for which there is no warrant in the Word of God. If you want Heaven, you must find it before you die. "Going to Heaven" is simply going to Christ. All that constitutes Heaven is in him. To know him is to have eternal life. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." That life is a present possession. The present enjoyment of it is imperfect, only because immeasurable difficulties render present communion with Christ imperfect. We taste Heaven now as we see Jesus "through a glass darkly." After death, when we "see him as he is," and "face to face," we shall have Heaven in all of its ineffable fullness and glory.

I am quite familiar with the objections that have been urged against this view. It is claimed that we confine celestial enjoyments to a comparatively narrow range when we say that Heaven is simply to be with Christ, and love him, and praise him. Mr. Beecher was quite rebellious at the idea that Heaven is a place where God, in the person of Christ, sits upon a visible throne, and requires his myriads of saints and angels to spend eternity singing songs and blowing trumpets to his praise. He thought there would be a very wearisome monotony in such a service. The Scriptures do not support any such view of Heaven; and I do not know of any intelligent Christian who holds to the conception which Mr. Beecher so vigorously repudiated.

The Bible does not teach that the solitary occupation of the redeemed in heaven will be singing songs and blowing trumpets to the praise of God. The man who believes that it does is a crazy literalist. In revealing to us the realities of the future life, the inspired writers were compelled to use imagery—figures of speech. In no other way could they give us an idea of supersensuous and divine things. Their pictorial representations of the future state of the redeemed were meant to teach us that the worship of God there, as here, is the highest and most satisfying act of the human soul.

Where is it that our souls are in closest touch with God? Where is it that we are the most conscious of the divinity within us? Where is it that our spiritual faculties experience the best illumination and the highest and sweetest exaltation? Where is it that "Heaven comes down the soul to greet, and glory crowns the mercy-seat?" It is where we worship God "in spirit and in truth." It is in the secret chamber of prayer, where we speak to God, and God speaks to us in the still small voice of his spirit. It is also in his holy temple where every faculty of the soul is lifted up and enraptured by the inspirations of sacred music, and the consecrated spot on which we stand is transformed into a Mount of Transfiguration. Now, think of these blessed experiences multiplied and intensified a thousand fold, and you will at least approximate a right conception of the sublimity and the satisfying rapture of heavenly worship. But in that better life, we shall do more than speak and sing God's praise.

Death will not destroy our identity. We shall be the same beings in the next world that we are in this. We shall have the same intellectual and spiritual faculties; and when these faculties are exalted and expanded, as they doubtless will be after they cease to be fettered by their earthly environment, we shall engage in loftier and more diversified employments than have ever occupied us here. Complete absorption of a man's faculties in the service of Christ in this life does not restrict his energies or render his movements monotonous. Whose faculties were more thoroughly concentrated and riveted upon a single object than William Carey's—the consecrated cobbler—when he undertook the work of converting India to the faith of the Gospel? Of all the men who have lived in the nineteenth century, I know not one whose life was less restricted and less monotonous than Carey's.

There is nothing that so quickens, expands and exalts a man's mind, and nothing that gives such amplitude, variety and power to his life as the inspiration of that grandest affection called "the love of Christ." Now if there is such range and variety of activity to be found in the service of Christ on earth, how much vaster the range and greater the variety in the same service continued in heaven, where the field is infinitely broader and grander, and every object, from the beauty of the crystal sea to the majestic glory which crowns the Saviour's brow, fires the redeemed soul with the loftiest aspirations.

The novice in Bible study is apt to be confused by the variety of the imagery which is employed to set before us the felicity of the celestial world. He is apt to be confused especially by the fact that the images used for this purpose, "if taken in a natural sense, are quite incompatible with each other." In the one place heaven is pictured as a great city with high walls. In another place it is an open country with trees and streams of water—a country resembling the land which God gave to the ancient Israelites.

In one place heaven is set before us as a world where there is no more sea; and in another it is a great sea of glass. In one place it is a house of many apartments; and in another it is a mountain covered with innumerable worshippers. But, if you will read carefully, you will find that this truth stands out in each picture—that Christ is the central figure, the culminating glory, and the source of all blessedness in heaven.

There are no discords and divisions in heaven. Why? Because Christ is love, and all beings there take their law and temper from him. Nothing that defileth or maketh a lie can enter heaven. Why? Because he is the gate-keeper and he is pure and true. In heaven there will be no sickness, no care and sorrow for anything, no blighted hopes, no disappointment, no anxious forelooking, no fear, no wounded affections, no heart-aches, no remorse, no unsatisfied longing. Why? Because Christ is there, and "in his presence there is fulness of joy." We have enough in having him. We shall be satisfied when we awake in his likeness.

This view of the subject disposes of all such questions as, "How can I be happy in heaven, if I take with me there the memory of my own wrong-doings, and of the cares and struggles and griefs of loved ones left behind me?" or, "How can I be happy there and know that an impassable gulf separates me forever from my father, or my mother, or my wife, or my child?" All such problems will dissolve and disappear in the ineffable light of Christ's visible presence. To have Christ as our everlasting portion, is to have every element of happiness.—everything that is comprehended in the word, heaven.

This doctrine makes large room for the differing notions that men have about heaven, and their differing degrees of sensibility to the next world. I find some Christians who have such constant and blessed fellowship with Jesus here, and who are so busy with the Christian duties of this life, that they are but little inclined to think about heaven. The most godly, active, humble, self-denying Christian that I know to-day, is a woman, who, during an intimate acquaintance of many years, has scarcely spoken to me about what is to come after death. She so enjoys the Master here, and mind and hands and heart are so constantly and earnestly engaged in his work in this lower world, that she has but little opportunity or inclination to think of what her state will be in the world above. Other true and faithful Christians derive most of their comfort and happiness, and most of their inspiration for duty, from thinking of the glory that shall be revealed to them when mortality is swallowed up of life, and their feet tread the crystal pavement of the Eternal City.

Some of God's people cling to one aspect of the heavenly state and some to another. What feature is most pleasing, inspiring and comforting to us is determined largely by our present temperament, condition, and environment. If a believer is having a life-long struggle with poverty, it will be a sweet consolation to him to think of an eternal residence in a country of plenty, and where he will never again have to grapple with such questions as "What shall I eat? What shall I drink? and wherewithal shall I be clothed?" A Christian woman, wasting away under a long and painful illness, pointed with skeleton hand to the sky and said, "There I shall be well."

Southey was wont to speak of Heaven as the home of sanctified genius, where gifted spirits hold exalted fellowship. He longed to see and converse with Shakespeare, Dante and Chaucer. The ruling aspiration of John Foster was to explore the secrets of the spiritual universe. His sublime soul was restive under the limitations of the present life. It was like a courser panting to leap the barrier; like an eagle dragging at its chain, beating the bars of its prison and longing to soar above the clouds. He thought of Heaven as a place that will give free and ample scope to his truth-seeking and wonder-loving spirit. Take the Christian to whom home and family are very dear, and who when far away in a strange land or on a troubled sea, is accustomed to sit alone in the twilight and sing, "Home! home! sweet, sweet home! Be it never so humble, there's no place like home," and you will find that his fondest conception of Heaven is that it is for those who have been exiles, strangers and pilgrims here, a home of infinite rest.

God has planted in my own breast an almost boundless admiration for heroism—especially moral heroism. My favorite study has been the biographies of heroes. In selecting men to be my companions, I look first for courage, courage to know and speak and act the truth. In a world of trimmers, and time-servers, and place-seekers, and moral cowards, my heart bounds with ecstatic joy when I find a man who holds himself immeasurably above the dastardly principle that "we must do in Rome what Romans do." Having this intense admiration for courage and this passionate fondness for brave men, it is a feast to my soul to think of Heaven as the gathering place of God's heroes. And no intelligent Christian can read the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, and John's description of the glorified martyrs, without admitting that this conception is true. I want to see brave old Noah, who for more than a hundred years withstood the ridicule of the whole world. I want to see Moses, who had the sublime courage to step down from the wealth and splendor and power of a prince—an heir apparent to the throne of Egypt—and identify himself with the afflicted and enslaved people of God. I want to see those apostles, who, when sentenced to be whipped, and threatened with death, stood before the court which condemned them and said, "We will obey God rather than men." I want to see Paul, whom neither bonds, nor imprisonments, nor stripes, nor the fury of mobs, nor the wrath of kings could conquer. I want to see Polycarp, who could not be constrained even by the torture of flames to deny Christ. I want to see Martin Luther, who faced the wicked vengeance of Papal Rome without a tremor. I want to see the old Bedford Baptist, John Bunyan, who would lie in jail "'till moss grew over his eyebrows before he would surrender his right to preach the Gospel without the license of the king."

Neither man nor angel could depict the rapture that will fill my soul, if through God's mercy I shall be permitted to sit down in the Kingdom of Heaven and look into the faces of such men. But my admiration for these heroes will not blind me to the fact that it was Christ in them that made them brave and faithful unto death. They were conquerors through him, and all the glory of their achievements will merge into the imperishable glory that encircles his brow. In that best abode Christ is all and in all; without his presence nothing there could render us happy. It is the light radiating from his face that makes all the beauty and all the bliss of Heaven. Blessed Saviour! Giver of all good! Thou art of all thy gifts, thyself the crown.

THE BLESSED HOPE.

The Apostolic Expectation of Blessing at the Second Advent of Christ.

BY REV. [illegible]

THE Apostolic writers deal with this subject each according to the particular constitution of his mind. The differences in the character of James, Peter, John and Paul cause them to read the blessed hope from different points of view. But to each of the four it was, as we shall see, the great central event to which they looked as the supreme culmination and the most potent motive.

The Epistle of James brings before us the great doctrine of submission as one great portion of sanctification, and he speaks of this submission as only possible when the coming of the Lord is held in view; and this submission has a twofold sense—submission to the law and submission to suffering.

Turning to Peter's Epistles, we find him the man of action. His leading idea seems to have been devotion to the person of our Lord. It is quite true that holiness is the grand point, but the particular point of holiness emphasized is that of service toward Christ as Lord. Peter finds in holiness the great field for active service, and looks forward to the full realization of this at the coming of the Lord Jesus. We are called to active service, and to the endurance of suffering and tribulation, on account of existing evil around us. Peter rejoices not only in service for Christ, but also in suffering for and fighting for his Lord and he continually reminds his readers of the day of Christ's coming as an encouragement to valor.

Then the character of John's Epistles indicates that his leading thought was the satisfaction he had found in his Saviour. He lived and died with the one idea that Christ is all in all. In his Gospel he sets forth how that Jesus, who is the Son of God, lived and died that we might become the sons of God. We as sons of God find in him endless satisfaction. In connection with this entire satisfaction in Christ, and the glorious doctrine of our unification with him, our union and communion with him, we are reminded that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.

Now the Epistles of Paul set before us not only final redemption, but on account of the peculiar breadth of view of the writer, guided and used by the Holy Ghost, we have in his epistles all the peculiar aspects referred to in other epistles. Take one epistle alone (1.Thess.) and there we find all these aspects presented. In the first chapter we have his leading idea of conversion—turned to God from idols, to wait for his Son from Heaven. In the next chapter you find submission inculcated. In the third chapter we have Peter's view of holiness and activity in service. In the fourth chapter we have the full satisfaction of the believer to whom Christ is all in all; the chapter concluding with a description of the coming Lord. In the fifth chapter, verse 23, we find the full and finally completed redemption for which we wait until the coming of the Lord.

So we find in one Epistle those varied aspects; if in one we so find them, may we not expect that in other Epistles they will be found? And so it is. In Rom. 8, 1 Cor. 15, Phil. 3, we have the coming as affecting the individual believer, and in Eph. 5 as specially concerning the Church. Now the second Advent is the most practical of all subjects, and I believe nothing can so stir a man to conform himself to God's will as the consideration of the coming of Christ; and nothing will stir him more vigorously to activity in doing and daring, suffering and serving, for his Lord and Master. In the eternal life of a believer, what can more deeply fill up our satisfaction with Christ, knowing that he is coming who is our beloved, who is longing for us more eagerly than we can long for him?

Thus the four strikingly contrasted characters are as one in drawing from this hope their stimulus and courage, and from Peter, John and James no less than from the broad field of the Apostle Paul; we are urged to dwell on that time when this poor sin-stricken world shall welcome its Lord, when the groaning creation shall cease its groans, and we cry, O Lord, how long, how long, until we see this grand, complete and final deliverance which thou shall manifest at thy appearing. Surely, as we look at this grand consummation of all our hopes, our intense longing shall burst forth in the eager cry, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Dec. 31. Ps. 115: 11-18; 73: 23, 24.

MILE-STONES in the journey of of life serve their most useful purpose when they suggest a review of the past. A scathing censure of a certain royal house was that its members forgot nothing and learned nothing. They remembered their punishments and the people who had inflicted them, but they never perceived their own mistakes and wrong-doing. Of such men there is no hope of growth or improvement. To every sincere, honest, humble man, his past is full of lessons. His defeats ought to be teachers as powerful as his victories. The sorrow and suffering he has endured, the very sins into which he has fallen,speak to him words of wise and precious counsel. He has suffered uselessly if he has learned nothing in the dark valley through which he has passed. As he stands for a brief hour at the passage from one year to another, he has an opportunity of gathering the lessons of his experience together and putting them to their fit uses. In such a survey the Christian's central, predominating thought will be of divine guidance. He has been led. God has held him by his right hand. How the consciousness of such a fact transforms our view of life! The path by which we have come no longer seems haphazard, the product of circumstances,or even the result of our own choice. To those who have trusted God, guidance has been given. The subtle influence, of which they have been unconscious, has been working, leading them by the way. Sometimes the path has been up-hill, or over rocky ground, and strength has been developed by the difficulties. Sometimes it has led by places where work was waiting to be done,and gratification has come from the doing of it, or sorrow for the missing of the opportunity. Times there have been when in self-confidence we have loosed the divine hand and have turned aside into some pleasant road, only to stumble and fall and to seek in humiliation and sorrow for the guiding hand to lead us once more. With the consciousness of such leading, life becomes a glorious past and a still more glorious possibility. Reminiscence is a record of God's dealing, the present is a time of divinely appointed duty and the future has no terrors, no apprehension. "I am continually with thee," is a basis for unshaken confidence,whatever may be our place or circumstances. And this path has no end. The grave is but a place where the outer garment is thrown off, before entering the region in which it is no longer needed. The path is leading thence to "the shining tablelands." What they are in detail we know not, but the same guidance is continued and experience bids us trust it unfalteringly. In the future hidden beyond the vail, there may be much that is strange, but we need not fear while our right hand is still held by him who has held it in life. At the very verge of the tomb we look [illegible] that God has done, he will continue to do.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CHRISTMAS.

More families this year than usual would welcome some addition to the resources for [illegible] Christmas. At holiday times any straitness of the finances there may be is felt painfully. Past celebrations are recalled and the poverty of the present is fully realized. It may be in the power of some Christian Endeavor Societies to send a ray of sunshine into such homes. Even if the gift be small it will give pleasure if it is accompanied by the message that "As you [illegible] we wish to recognize the bond and do a brother's part. Accept the gift for Christ's sake and in his name." The family to which such a gift and such a message goes will not feel that they are lonely or forgotten by Christ's people and givers and receivers alike will be the happier. Beside this there is the promise Christ gave of his blessing on just such gifts. (Matt. 10: 42.)

The practical method of doing such work is sometimes not very well managed. To any who are in difficulty about it the following plan which the Endeavor Herald says was tried in Societies at Peterboro' Canada, and worked well, may serve as a guide: A union relief committee was formed by the appointment of two from each Society. Each Society obtained the names of all the poor in its congregation, such names being placed on the collection plate by request from the pastor. Special collections for this relief work were taken up in each Society, and special contributions were solicited from friends in the country. The day before Christmas as large a number of Endeavorers as possible got together at a central place sorted out the provisions, packed them in baskets, addressed them, and put on the cards Scripture texts. The baskets were sent out that afternoon.

TWO B. Y. P. U. CONVENTIONS.

Important Conventions of Baptist Young People's Unions have been held in Rhode Island and Oregon. The former was held at Pawtucket and was the first ever held in Rhode Island. Mr. J. W, Baker, President of the local Union, gave the address of welcome, to which Mr. F. T. Guild, Vice-President of the State Union, responded. Among the speakers on the programme were Rev: Whitman L. Wood and George E. Nichols, of Pawtucket; Rev. J. V. Osterhout, of Providence and Rev. J. K. Wilson of the Massachusetts Union. The following officers were elected: President, John L. Alger; Vice-Presidents, W. A. Austin, J. W. Baker, and Rev. J. S. Russell; Secretary, E. K. Andrews; Assistant Secretary, Miss Hattie S. Magoon; Treasurer. W. Howard Peffer. At the evening session President E. B. Andrews, of Brown University, addressed the delegates and was followed by Rev. Alex. Blackburn, of Cambridge, Mass. The attendance and the spirit manifested indicates that the B. Y. P. U. has taken firm hold in Rhode Island.

The Oregon Committee assembled at Pendleton and surprised every one by the number of delegates in attendance. It was announced among other interesting facts that Oregon had the distinction of containing the largest Junior Society of the Union. It is in connection with Rev. G. Parker's church at Oregon City and numbers 280 members. Dr. J. O. Burroughs, Prof. W. L. German and Mr. O. P. Coshow were among the prominent speakers. An earnest address on consecration by Mr. Gilman Parker led to so deep an interest that the meeting became like a revival service, and Mr. Parker remained after the Convention to hold evangelistic services among the young people.

THE Y. M. C. A. AT OMAHA, NEB.

On this page we give a picture of the fine building occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association of Omaha,Neb. This is one of the most successful of Western Associations, as it has a membership of 565, with more than half of them on the active list. It was organized twenty-five years ago, and has made phenomenal progress. Its building is centrally located on the corner of Sixteenth and Douglas streets, and is in all respects a home to be proud of. Its cost was $115,000 in addition to the lot,which is worth $5,000. It contains gymnasium, baths, library, reading-room, class-rooms in which six branches of secular study are pursued, and over a hundred students avail themselves of the opportunities. The religious meetings and Bible classes are also largely attended. A boys' auxiliary is connected with the Association.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

Missouri has now one hundred and fifty chapters of the Epworth Leage which have registered and complied with all the conditions of enrollment. The organization and enthusiastic spirit of the League in that State are excellent.—In St. Louis, Mo., the Marvin League has almost entire charge of the Sunday School with six hundred pupils and League methods are adopted for looking up absentees and new scholars.—The St. Louis "Christian Advocate" says that a diplomatic pastor, who found that his Sunday evening service was poorly attended, although at the League Prayer Meeting before the service the members mustered in force, asked the League if it would kindly take charge of the musical part of the evening service. The League accepted and from that time the evening congregations were large. The pastor thinks his plan was a better one than upbraiding members of the League for not waiting for the evening service.—At the recent Convention of the League of the Newark, N. J., district the Secretary reported that four new additions raised the number of chapters to forty. The suggestion was made and approved that the office of Corresponding Secretary should be permanent instead of being filled annually as that and other offices have been. The object is to facilitate correspondence with other Leagues and prevent letters going astray.—The Leagues of the South-west Kansas Conference held a three days' Convention at Wichita recently. General Secretary Schell cheered the young people by his presence and encouraging words. Three hundred delegates were present.—During the past three months twenty-five German chapters have been enrolled.—The idea of the Epworth Guards has struck the popular taste in the churches. Iowa and Illinois report efficient companies already.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The B.Y.P.U. of Tabor, Iowa, is enlivened by some vigorous debates on the relations of Theology and Science. Several professors of Tabor College have taken part in them.

The Young Men's Christian Associations of Ireland are a most energetic and progressive body. The Cork Association has a beautiful new building almost ready for occupancy.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Belfast, Ireland, is sending a lady missionary to Morocco who will be supported by the Association. It already supports two ladies in China and one in Ceylon,who are doing valuable work.

The Central Y. M. C. A. of Liverpool, England, has set a good example by opening its auditorium every Saturday evening and providing a bright and cheerful entertainment free. Every young man in the city has heard of "The Pleasant Saturday Evening," at the Association, and its rooms are crowded by young and old. Many a wife and mother has been pleasantly surprised by receiving intact the wages which formerly were sadly depleted by the evening's amusement in saloon or theatre.

The Christian Endeavor Constitution is now published in six languages — English, French, German, Swedish, Norwegian and Danish.

Christian Endeavor Societies desiring to celebrate Christian Endeavor day (Feb. 2), can obtain a suggestive order of exercises from the United Society, 646 Washington street, Boston, Mass.

The only Young Men's Christian Association in America for Japanese young men exclusively is that in San Francisco.This organization has passed its seventh birthday and is in a very flourishing condition.

Several of the active members of the Geneva, Switzerland,Y.M. C.A., have organized an Evangelistic campaign into the villages and rural districts.

The B. Y. P. U. is taking another step in advance in Illinois. A Union for the State of Swedish Baptist young people was effected in the First Swedish Church, Chicago, recently. Mr. C. E.Oberg,of the Second Swedish Church, Chicago, was chosen president, and with him are associated a number of earnest workers among the Swedish Baptists.

The Young Women's Christian Association, of Toledo, O., celebrates next week its third anniversary. In that short time the membership has grown from a mere handful to over six hundred, and is still increasing. Beside its spiritual work, it has educational classes under efficient teachers.

The Young Men's Christian Associations of Indiana have held a great Convention at Marion. President Coulter of Lake Forest University and Dr. William Bryan of Indiana University,were among the speakers. The convention occupied four days and showed that Association work was making progress in the State.

The Epworth League Chapters of Detroit, Mich., have arranged a system of fraternal visitation. Each Chapter appoints two of its members as a delegation to visit other Chapters of the city. Their duties cover three months, during which they will visit every Chapter. In this way mutual suggestion will be afforded, and each Chapter will be benefited.

In North-western Missouri the B.Y.P.U, is making rapid progress. At a recent Convention at St. Joseph there was a very large attendance and several eminent ministers assisted in making the convention a profitable occasion.

PILGRIMS ON THE MARCH TO BETHLEHEM.

THE QUIET HOUSE.

O MOTHERS, worn and weary
With cares which never cease,
With never time for pleasure,
With days that have no peace;
With little hands to hinder
And feeble steps to guard,
With tasks that lie unfinished—
Deem not your lot too hard.

I know a house where childish things
Are hidden out of sight;
Where never a sound of little feet
Is heard from morn till night;
No tiny hands that fast undo,
That pull things all awry,
No baby hurts to pity
As the quiet days go by.

And she—the sad-eyed mother—
What would she give to-day
To feel your cares and burdens,
To walk your weary way!
Ah! happiest on all this earth,
Could she again but see
The rooms all strewn with playthings,
The children 'round her knee!

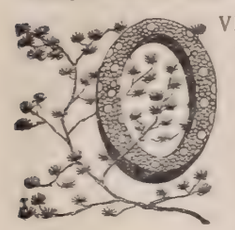
CHRISTMAS THE WORLD OVER.

How the Sacred Festival is Observed in Many Lands—The Week in Bethlehem.



VER all the world, at this festive season are heard the ringing of sweet Christmas bells, and the glad song that tells the story of the Babe of Bethlehem. In the City of David, a host of pilgrims from every land under the sun has gathered, to worship at the Manger-shrine, and to gaze with awe and reverent love upon the scene of the Nativity. The ancient church—the oldest probably in the world—which contains the Grotto of the Manger, is crowded with worshipers morning and evening during the week, and sweet hymns ascend to heaven from before its altars. There Greek, Armenian, Copt and Latin, representatives of the most ancient forms of the Christian faith, worship together harmoniously beside the Cradle of Christ.

During the Christmas week, the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem is crowded with pilgrims of every nationality. Caravans (such as that shown in our illustration on this page), come from Egypt, from Damascus and other points, and there is a ceaseless stream of travel from the Jaffa Gate of Jerusalem along the highway toward Bethlehem. There the travelers find shelter, either in tents or at the various convents, which are hospitably open. In Jerusalem, too, the anniversary of the Saviour's birth is celebrated by the various Christian denominations by special services in the churches; but the principal observance throughout all Syria is that which takes place at the Manger-Shrine in the little white-walled city of Bethlehem.

There are many beautiful customs connected with the Christmas season in other lands, of which the children of the East are totally ignorant. No Santa Claus brightens the dreams of the little ones of Syria, and no baby stockings are hung up over-night for him to fill. Few Eastern children ever saw a Christmas tree, unless, indeed, they luckily happened to get a glimpse of one that had been set up by some family who had imported the pretty custom from abroad. Thus, by a singular anomaly, the anniversary of Jesus' birth is less generally remembered in Palestine than in many other lands. In Russia, every family, except the very poorest, has its traditional tree, and all the villages are "en fete." It is a season for the betrothal of young people, the giving of presents and pretty processions of children in fanciful costumes. In France, the celebration begins at midnight on Christmas Eve, and is especially enthusiastic in the villages and rural districts. In England, the Yule-tide is the merriest time of the whole year, and feasting, present-giving and entertainment are the rule everywhere. In the country homes of the "gentry," the yule-log roars on the hearth, and the rollicking games that have been indulged every Christmas for centuries, are revived for the benefit of the young folks.

Yule (so-called from the old Saxon word "uile," the name of the festival), is the crown of the year in other countries of Europe as well as Victoria's little island domain. Spain, Italy, Austria and Germany each celebrate after their own national fashion, and the Greek Church in Russia and the Latin in Southern Europe then perform their most splendid and impressive rites. In Rome, Madrid and Vienna, the Jubilee absorbs the energies of the entire population, and the churches are crowded to the doors. In our own land, the anniversary has become almost universal, and in Mexico it is a season of religious and social celebration in which rich and poor participate.

To Germany the civilized world is indebted for one of the most enjoyable of Christmas delights, the Christmas tree. This custom was little known in England before the present century. It has a pagan origin and behind the quaint figure of Kris Kringle, with his tree laden with gifts and glittering with lanterns, is the more ancient toy pine tree, hung with "oscilla," which boys and girls in ancient Rome looked for on the sixth and seventh days of the Saturnalia. A wide gulf is fixed between the Puritanic days, when Christmas was frowned upon as a remnant of evil superstition, and to-day, when nothing is too rare or good for the making of our homes bright, and our sanctuaries beautiful in honor of the Author of the Christian feast. Wherever civilized man is found, there, in one form or another, we find also the tokens of adoration and gratitude at Christmas.

Each may do "Something."

You life may be cast in humble lines, and you may not be brilliant in prayer or exhortation; yet you may, if you will, do some service, however simple, for the Master's sake. A beautiful story is told in connection with the work of the Countess of Huntingdon among the colliers in the English Black Country. Finding that many of these poor miners had never heard of Christ, she sent out preachers to hold meetings among them in the open air. Whitefield, Venn, the Wesleys, were among her helpers. In a cabin on her estate there was a crippled blind girl, named Eliza Poulard, who heard of this great work. She was carried to the castle, and asked to see Lady Huntingdon. "Can I help?" she inquired, humbly. "I never have done anything for God." The servants would have driven her away, but the countess interfered. "She is lame and blind, and scared at her own voice," they said. "God calls his own messengers," replied the countess. "Carry her to the meeting to-night at the mines."

Eliza had learned many hymns, and her voice was a most touching one. When she sang to the colliers of Christ upon the cross, the women cried out and the men wept. No words of the preachers were as powerful as the song of the poor cripple. They carried her from one place to another, and many people were converted. When Lady Huntingdon told her of the souls she had influenced for good, her poor face grew beautiful. "Who would have thought He would have chosen me," she said.

Not all of God's chosen instruments are eminent and gifted. A word in season, a kind deed, an arm to help, a simple song may touch the heart, where eloquence and persuasion have failed.

Bird-Love for Their Benefactors.

At this season when, owing to snow and frost, the birds have a rather hard time of it securing food for the nest, our young friends, especially those who dwell in the country, can make some very pleasant acquaintances among the feathered tribes by providing for their wants from the superabundance of the home table. Two ladies had a somewhat remarkable experience with a robin which they had treated kindly. Whenever they walked out, the robin would accompany them, though it was observed one sister was a greater favorite than the other. If this lady went out, the robin would accompany her at once. The sisters after a time went to live elsewhere, and were in great grief at leaving the bird behind, but he would not allow himself to be caught. On the way to their new home, they were surprised to see the robin flying along by the carriage. He accompanied them all the way, and the next morning was pecking as usual at their window. He took up his abode in the neighborhood, and continued till he died, attending upon them in their walks.

Ruskin's Idea of Childhood.

When John Ruskin on one occasion was addressing an assembly of men at Camberwell, he told them if they wanted to be perfect workmen they must become like child-like. And he gave them four marks of right childhood. To be modest is the first note of right childhood, according to this good and wise man. To be faithful is the second; there is nothing better than to be a trusty and trustworthy child. To be loving is the third; and it must be love that shows itself in real kindness and helpfulness. To be cheerful is the fourth and last essential; and the humble, trustful, loving child will be full of God's own cheer.

Home Hospitality.

It is frequently stated that good old-fashioned hospitality is on the decline. Families more and more shut their family life carefully from the world, and few are privileged to enter the inner circles of the home. This cannot be helped, and perhaps should not even be deprecated. The effect of civilization and of culture is always to promote and emphasize the individuality of persons and of families, and to make repugnant the promiscuous companionship of the crowd or of strangers. A change has also come over those who should be guests. It is a common thing for lecturers, writers and distinguished people who travel, to instruct their agents to say they prefer stopping at hotels.

There is in many homes too little elasticity in home life; things are too much fixed in certain routines, and comparatively few hostesses understand the art of making a guest comfortable.

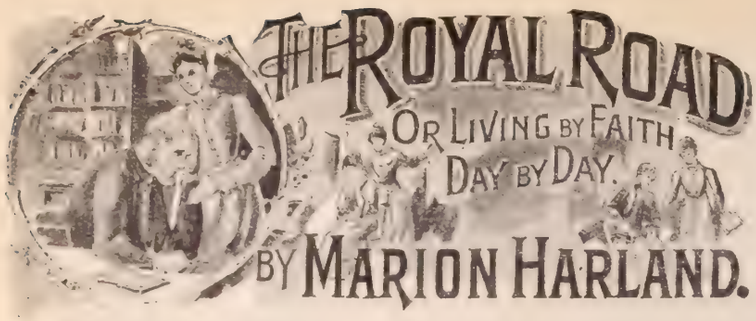
Parents and Daughters.

The poorest girls in the world are those who have never been taught to work. There are thousands of them. They have been taught to despise labor, and depend upon others for a living, and are perfectly helpless. The most forlorn and miserable women belong to this class. It belongs to parents to protect their daughters from this deplorable condition. They do them a great wrong if they neglect it. Every daughter ought to be taught to earn her own living. The rich are very likely to become poor, and the poor rich. The good Lord, whose Son worked with his own hands intended that none should be idle.



CHAPTER II. (Continued.)

BROOKLYN is the safest place on the globe for unescorted women by day, or by night, and this Mrs. Paull carried herself so like a lady-born who minded her own business and let otherpeoples' business alone, that she would not be insulted even in New York. But—and the "but" was deep, and broad, and long, and high—there was the billiard-table in the front basement, and a something everybody felt and nobody succeeded in defining, in the general air and tone of the household that deterred sober housekeepers and householders from making advances to the strangers in their midst. And, finally, the new folks did not appear to have any regular church connection. When the father spent Sunday at home, he sat near the front windows, looking like a picture, or a nobleman on the stage, in a black velvet smoking-jacket and read the thirty-two pages of the paper while church-goers trooped by, to and from their various places of worship. In the summer months when Mrs. Paull and Elspeth held the fort, they went to church somewhere every Sunday, without fail. Since the children got back the mother usually accompanied them, presumably to some place of worship on Sunday forenoon, but they went, sometimes up-street, sometimes down,—a circumstance that pointed to spiritual tramphood.

In Brooklyn, a church home;—to wit a pew, the rent of which is paid promptly, and participation in Sunday-School or parish-work, together with a kindly desire to do good and to communicate to one's fellow-Christians—constitutes a passport to the hearts and homes of "regular residents." It may be a primitive state of society in cosmopolitan eyes, but it is apostolic — and Christ-like. The household of faith is not an empty phrase; the band holding together the communion of saints is strong and of pure gold.

Thus stood affairs with the Paulls in their immediate neighborhood on the evening of the twenty-second of November, the Friday preceding Thanksgiving week.

Within doors, Scotch Elspeth, sitting over her tea in the kitchen, heard her mistress's step in the lower hall, and arose mechanically as Mrs. Paull entered. The fifty,year-old girl had "gentle-folk ways" in such matters. Unless deprived of the use of her lower limbs, she would as soon have thought of standing on her head as of remaining seated when receiving orders from an employer. The entrance of the latter was to her like the drill-sergeant's "Attention!" to rank and file.

Mrs. Paull was dressed for walking. She was never florid; to-night her very lips were colorless;—there were livid semi-circles under her eyes which were dull and deep; but her voice was even, and she spoke, as always, pleasantly to the elderly servant.

"Elspeth, I have put the children to bed, amd am going out for a long walk. My head aches badly, and the walk may do me good."

"It's very damp, ma'am."

Elspeth had been an American for forty years without ridding her tongue of the North Country "burr." She was, secretly, vain of her excellent English, firmly persuaded in her own mind that nobody would ever guess her nationality from her speech, whereas she betrayed it in feature, voice and accent to the least observant. When excited, she lapsed into the vernacular. On this occasion she did not quite say "verra," but they suggested the broader vowel, and she rolled a pair of r's.

"I never take cold, you know, and I have my waterproof. Please leave the kitchen-door open that you may hear the children should they awake."

"I will, ma'am. Do not give yesel' ony uneasiness aboot them. They'll likely not stir till ye get back."

"Thank you! I hope they will not be t[illegible]."

The domestic never betrayed inquisitiveness, however eccentric might seem the behavior of any member of the household. Her scorn of gossip extended to her self-communings, yet she shook her iron-gray head at the clang of the closing front door, and poured out a third cup of tea with an audible sigh.

Mr. Lanier, Mrs. Paull's brother, and a trustee under their father's will of her portion of the patrimonial estate, had spent a long time with his sister that afternoon. He looked grave and preoccupied when Elspeth admitted him, and to her eyes Mrs. Paull had worn an unnatural aspect ever since. True, she made talk with the three children over their evening meal, only cautioning Tom not to laugh too loudly, for "Mamma had a headache." She chatted cheerfully with them on the way up to bed, too, and would make Elspeth go down to supper while she undressed Gladys with her own hands.

"But she's aye one to keep hersel' to hersel'," reflected the discreet Scotch girl.

She almost deserved the name when she took service with Mr. Lanier twenty-five years before. At "Miss Alice's" marriage she had asked to be allowed to go with her to her new home as chambermaid and seamstress, and had followed her young lady's fortunes faithfully ever since. Until after the birth of Tom, the third child, she had had assistants in the housework, sometimes three or four fellow-servants. Then began the gradual decline in the apparent prosperity of the wedded pair. There was a bad crash about the time Gladys was born, five years ago, a crash so loud that the world heard it. Ernest Paull's business career for fifteen years had been a descending scale; one year a hitch, another a break; a third a drag, with wheels that creaked dryly. His father-in-law had set him up in divers businesses of various degrees of promise, once and again, and as everybody knew, although not from him or his son, had lost heavily from hitch and crash, having furnished the oil for the creaking wheels.

At his death, two years prior to the date of our first chapter, he had left his daughter Alice twenty-five thousand dollars in real estate and stocks, but so tied up by legal knots that she could not touch the interest without the consent of her trustees and her father's executors, while the principal was strictly entailed upon her children. The purport of the testament was unmistakable. Mr. Lanier, Sr., did not mean that his son-in-law should profit directly by any more of his money.

Elspeth had assuredly never been told what were the provisions of the will, or why they should be particularly obnoxious to "Miss Alice's" husband, but a pretty accurate knowledge of the state of family politics had filtered into her mind. Mr. Paull had broken out several times when she was within ear-shot into caustic gibes relative to his wife as a property-holder, and himself as her pensioner, and, whereas, up to the senior Lanier's decease, Ernest had maintained apparently friendly relations with his brother-in-law, it was yet more apparent now that the relations between the two men were strained to the point of parting.

Once, while removing the dishes from the table, the discreet hand-maiden had heard the master of the house say in reply to a question from Edwin, the youngest boy:

"'Why don't I stay at home like other little children's fathers?' Because, my son, this is not my home any more. It is mamma's house, and everything in it belongs to her. She holds the purse-strings, and your Uncle Roger tells her just how much money she can have to support you and your brothers and sisters. If you were older, you would understand that the interest of twenty-five thousand dollars at four-and-a-half per cent, —(your uncle doesn't believe in a higher rate than that) won't lodge, feed and clothe eight people. Especially, when one of the eight has been brought up as the daughter of one millionaire and the sister of another. Poor papa having spent all the money he has made in the last twenty years, upon his wife and children, must scuffle for himself for the rest of his life."

His wife's eyes had blazed indignantly at him from a deathly-white face, as he said it, but not a word escaped her.

The scene was one of many that made Elspeth return thanks morning and night that she "belonged to nae mon, gentle or simple, but could gang her ain gait wi' nane to say, 'Why do ye sae!'" Her mistress' economies would have enlightened her partially as to the financial stress that had overtaken the family, had none of these streamlets of information trickled into her ears. The faithful creature had to be taken into confidence so far as to be made to comprehend that Mr. Paull had had heavy losses, and that, since the children must be educated, there was little to spare for luxurious comforts, nothing for superfluities. She knew what Marie, the elder daughter and her mother's intimate associate, did not seem to notice—that Mrs. Paull had not bought one new article for herself since she put on black for her father, that napkins and table-cloths, sheets, and even towels, were darned as long as the old threads would bear the new, and that the children's underclothes, frocks and jackets were mute miracles of the mother's skill in repairing and making over.

Mr. Paull's costume showed no sign of thoughtful thrift. To be well dressed was a part of the stock-in-trade of a "man on the road." He had traveled for several houses in the last five years, his handsome face and pleasing address going further in recommending him to employers and customers than anybody but himself suspected. If he ever reckoned up his assets, he put these down at double their real value. He had no trouble in getting a position. Keeping it was another thing. In the "dull season," he found recreation at the Rangeley Lakes, Les Chenaux, or the Adirondacks. As a crack shot and expert fly-fisherman, he had what he would have described as "a national reputation," and was welcome wherever sportsmen congregated. The air of these resorts and the society found there were absolutely necessary for building up his health and spirits to sustain the hardships of the next winter's campaign.

As he informed his wife, he made barely enough to meet his few personal expenses and to pay the rent of a house in which his family could live. He had no home, and never expected to have one until his wife should buy a six-feet-two lot for him in Greenwood. There was an insurance of ten thousand dollars upon his worthless life, he would add, jocularly. Without alluding to the fact that Mrs. Paull paid the yearly premium upon it, he liked to jest upon the profit she would derive from his death. Perhaps she might prevail upon her trustee to spare her a few dollars for a slate headstone. Or, one of marbleized iron would make more show for less money. As to lettering, there would be no sense in wasting her wealth in epitaphical lies. "Here lies a failure!" would cover the whole ground, and unite truth and pathos.

He was sentimentally fond of his children, particularly of his pretty daughter, Marie, whose resemblance to himself was delicious flattery. Had he spent more time with them, he would have vitiated the mother's wholesome influence, As it was, with all the love and respect they bore her, they were inclined to pity him as the victim of circumstances, and Marie to wonder that mamma did not sell houses or stocks, or make some other effort to enable them all to live together the year round. When a hint of this veiled feeling transpired, Alice Paull held her peace. What was there that she could say?

She had never uncovered the grinning skeleton in the closet of her heart even to the brother, who was her confidant in all else, or so much as confessed to him that her husband had a fault.

He had visited her on this afternoon upon a painful errand, and as a man of sense and feeling, had done it without cruel delays. So-called preparation for bad news is but so many additional turns of the rack-screw.

Ernest Paull had gone abroad that morning, leaving a letter to be delivered to Roger Lanier after he had sailed. It commissioned him to break the truth to his sister. Mr. Paull had speculated with money collected by him for his late employers, and lost it. Since he had no private resources on which to draw for reparation of the misfortune, he had but one resort—flight.

Where he obtained funds for the voyage and the proposed sojourn in a foreign land, he did not see fit to specify. The date of his return was, in the circumstances, so remote and uncertain that his wife would act wisely in basing no calculations upon the event. She must shape her future course according to her own judgment and her brother's advice. This would be the easier, inasmuch as these had been the rule of her faith and practice for many months. Her husband, since his severe pecuniary losses set in, had been such an insignificant factor in her existence that his withdrawal from the scene of action would not affect her seriously, except so far as it wounded the Lanier pride. For himself, he had found this same pride an expensive—he might say a ruinous—luxury for a poor man.

Her marriage—before her judgment was matured by the influence of heredity and advice—to one whom she had chosen to treat as a cipher on the wrong side of the unit representing her potent personality—was the fatal blunder of her life. "I forbear to add, of mine also, conscious as I am that that would count for little in her opinion and that of her counsellors. My heart is wrung to bleeding by the thought of leaving my children (God bless and keep them forever.) Had I been permitted to exercise the sacred privilege, I would have proved myself more to them than a father in name only. As man and husband, I will not interfere with their mother's management of them. Sometimes I dream that in the days to come, when she sees reflected in their innocent faces the lineaments of the unhappy being whom she once believed that she loved; whose misfortune, not whose fault, it has been to forfeit that affection—she may so far compromise with her stern sense of rectitude as to let them speak of the exile, now and then, and affectionately. I cannot bear to think that my darlings will forget me utterly. I know that she will refrain from poisoning their minds again me. In this I trust to her magnanimity.

"This is the sum of my requests to your sister, Mr. Lanier. Knowing as I do, how severe are her ideas upon certain subjects, how relentless her prejudices against every form of speculation; that she esteems all games and operations in which chance has a part, as inventions of the Enemy of souls, I comprehend fully what degree of charity will be used in computing the iniquity of this, my latest and heaviest disaster."

Such was the letter placed in Alice Paull's hands by her brother with the simple preface; "My dear sister, I am the bearer of disagreeable news. It is all written here in your husband's hand. May our Heavenly Father grant you strength to bear it and to live for your children."

She read the four closely-written pages through, down to the signature, and turned back to the letter-head to see that it bore the date—"Fifth Avenue Hotel, Thursday morning, November the twenty-first, 188–," and letting her hand with the letter fall in her lap, looked down at it as at a horror that had changed her to stone.

"He is a thorough villain—a hypocritical villain!" said Roger Lanier in wrath the deeper for his enforced self-control. "He knew every word he has written concerning you to be a lie, deliberately planned to wound in the tenderest sensibilities the best, most patient, most heroic wife that was ever bestowed upon one so utterly unworthy of her."

She turned the letter over in stunned bewilderment, seeming to study it for further light.

"I have not been patient, brother, I have tried to do right, but I am not naturally amiable, as you know. Perhaps I have never understood him; never made allowances for the temperament and education that were so unlike mine."

"You have ruined your life for his sake!"

"I gave it to him when I married him—that and everything else I had or hoped to have—'for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer.'"

The low, hopeless tones, the dry eyes, worst of all, the wan, lightless smile that went with the words, cut the listener to the heart. He burst out with an impatient ejaculation.

"Alice! I cannot, I will not have you blame yourself. You shall not attempt to excuse him. Have I not seen the several steps of your disillusion, yet was obliged to hold my tongue? Ernest Paull has proved himself a specious, utterly selfish braggart, unstable in principle, in action—in everything but evil. You cannot conceal this from yourself. Why try to make me think that you do?"

A PIOUS QUEEN AND THE BIBLE.

Nov. 21, 1892, was the Queen of Madagascar's birthday, and it was celebrated by feasting, and by what is called the "fire festival." The whole country, just after sunset, was illuminated by thousands of torches. A special event on that day was the issuing of the first pocket edition of the Revised Bible. The books are in clear type, neatly bound but at so low a price as to be within the reach of most. This new edition of the Bible is esteemed a great boon, and the faces of the people brightened as they received the copies from loving hands.

DEAR SIR: —

The two reflectors which you put in the Hope Church have now been in use six months, and we have had ample opportunity to test their value. I am truthful to say they give unbounded satisfaction. Their handsome appearance adds much to the furnishing of the building; but their real value lies in their economy in the consumption of gas, and in the distribution of a mellow and pleasant light throughout the entire building. I have found from a practical experience with all methods, that the lighting of a building from a central reflector is vastly superior to any other method, and I believe yours is the best reflector made. You may make any use that you choose of this testimony, which is given for the benefit of those who are seeking the best results possible in the lighting of their church.

Sincerely yours,
RICHARD HARRIS,

CHRIST, THE ORATOR.*

THE Orator of the universe is Jesus Christ. His mission was to reveal God's love through human expression, to appeal to man's moral and spiritual nature to assert its dominion over the animal, and to seek its immortality and endless glory in divine truth. The most wonderful and perplexing person in the history of the human race is Jesus Christ. Men have been divided in regard to his claims and his mission, and have differed in the epithets applied to him. Struck with his wonderful, perfect, human qualities, some have cried, "Behold the Man!" Others, amazed at his manifestation of supernatural and spiritual power, have exclaimed, "Behold the God!" It may also be said of Christ, when the field of hismighty work as a preacher is surveyed, "Behold the Orator!"

If he wrought no miracles, as some say he did not, then he must have drawn the multitudes, that followed him so often, by his power as a speaker. We do not wish to detract anything from Christ's divine glory, but we are sincere and honest when we declare that, unless Christ is studied as an orator, much of the truth he has taught will not only fail to impress, but can hardly be truly comprehended.

It is exceedingly strange that nothing has been written on the subject of Christ as an orator, when our Lord himself claims that his mission was to speak to mankind. The prophet Isaiah speaks of Christ's mission in terms which clearly indicate its oratorical nature, "The spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord, and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he destroy the wicked." What higher equipment could be given a speaker than these gifts, wisdom, understanding, counsel, knowledge; or in what terms could his mission be more clearly indicated? Even the very acts of his life were to be oratorical He was not to judge the world with the sword, nor with the authority of a divine power, but, "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips will he slay the wicked." Could there be a more striking description of the mighty power of oratory than these words convey? By no weapon of war, by no exertion of material or supernatural forces was Christ to subdue the world, but by the gentle yet powerful implements of eloquence, the mouth and the breath.

If you look at a dozen common lamp-chimneys, and then at Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass," you will see the differences—all but one—they break from heat; these don't; you can't see that.

Common glass is misty, milky, dusty; you can't see through it; Macbeth's is clear.

Tough, clear glass is worth fine work; and a perfect chimney of fine tough glass is worth a hundred such as you hear, pop, clash on the least provocation.

A REVIVAL IN PRISON.

A glorious spiritual revival has begun among the convicts of Sing Sing Prison. Writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, one of the inmates of the prison says: "On the third day of last April our chaplain, Rev. J. C. S. Weills, gathered a little company of a dozen convicts who professed to be Christians and administered to them the Holy Communion. On the next day, three of these convicts at noontime assembled in the corner of the shop in which they worked and held a little prayer meeting. It was continued daily at that hour and God heard the prayers and sent his blessing. The attendance increased, convicts became converts and now there are three daily prayer meetings at noon, composed entirely of prisoners, and the last communion, held about six weeks ago, revealed the presence of over fifty professing Christians, and seven candidates for baptism.

"No church in the outer world exhibits a more interested and attentive audience than is seen in our prison chapel each Sunday morning, and yesterday morning the interest seemed so deep that our chaplain invited any who felt serious about their salvation to communicate with him. The converts need religious reading matter and this is why I write to you. Are there not, among your subscribers, some who would feel that they were doing Christ's own will by sending their old CHRISTIAN HERALDS to some prisoner? 'He that soweth precious seed in the fields of Christ shall one day be glad with Christ and his harvest.' This paper has been of much moral and spiritual benefit to men in this prison and I believe God intends that it shall continue to benefit them."

means more than mere care of self. It means the responsibility of others. The health of babies, children and husbands is looked after by mother and wife, and although the task is hard enough at best it is surely easier when the mother realizes the significance of nourishment. You can ask any physician of standing, or consult any standard book and learn that more physical ills are made possible by insufficient or improper nourishment than any other initial cause.

Scott's Emulsion

the Cream of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites, makes babies and children fat and robust because it is a nourishment. It cures Anæmia and Blood Diseases because it enriches and nourishes the blood. It prevents the Development of Consumption by nourishing the system, making new lung tissue and supplying strength. It cures Coughs and Colds and gives strength to the weak. In a word, Scott's Emulsion restores a natural condition of health. It is palatable. Physicians, the world over, endorse it.

THE APOSTLES' FOUNTAIN.

A Famous Spring in Palestine, with many Sacred Associations A Land of Fountains and Living Streams.

PASSING through strange lands, there is nothing in nature that gladdens the eye of the traveler so much as a spring of clear, sparkling water, gushing forth from the rocky hillside, or bubbling up in crystal wavelets from the earth at his feet. In all tropical countries, where the rainfall is scanty and streams often run dry, a living spring is held as almost priceless, and greatly enhances the value of the ground in the neighborhood. When such a spring is found in the desert or in any arid, desolate region, through which travelers have to pass, it is hailed as a boon from our kind Father, who supplies the wants of his children and comes to their relief in utmost need.

Such a spring is the "Fountain of the Apostles," (shown in our illustration) which is situated almost midway between Jerusalem and Jericho. The distance between these cities is rather more than fifteen miles through a wilderness, and travelers would faint and die by the way, were it not for this refreshing well, whose waters cool and revive them and their beasts, while the shade cast by the hillside affords a grateful resting-place in the hottest hours of the day when the fierce Syrian sun beats down with a relentless and withering glare. "The Apostles' Fountain," as the natives tell, received its name from the fact that the apostles, in their many journeyings between the two cities, made the spot a familiar rendezvous. It is about six or seven miles distant from Jerusalem. For many generations, the Judean shepherds and their flocks have assembled at the fountain to pass the noontide hour. Its clear stream of living water issues from the heart of the rocky cliff and is caught in the stone basin, from which it is conveyed into a trough for the use of animals. The waste forms a pool which waters the dry valley below. Some Sultan or other Moslem potentate has shown his appreciation of this famous spring by placing a tablet in the rock, immediately over the basin, and bearing an inscription in Arabic. Such inscriptions are found in many places throughout the East.

Palestine is a hilly country and abounds in water-springs and fountains. Its landscapes are dotted with wells whose names have been historic through many generations; yet, as a rule, its springs are short-lived, though remarkable for their abundance and beauty. Their importance can readily be gathered in the large number of topographical names which have the prefix "en" or "ain," as it is found in words like "Engedi," ("Spring of the Gazelle"). Some of the fountains of Palestine, are of great size, and it is to be noted that all the perennial rivers and streams in that country have their sources in fountains rather than in surface water, the Jordan rising from the fountains at Dan and Banias, and the Abana from those at Fijeh and Zebedany. In every valley and wood, the pleasant murmur of running water is heard and the foliage that overhangs those cooling streams is always green, luxuriant and beautiful.

"THE FOUNTAIN OF THE APOSTLES," ON THE ROAD TO JERICHO.
From a photograph secured by Dr. Talmage in the Holy Land.

Almost all the cities of the Holy Land are still supplied with water from fountains. Tyre walled in her abundant natural springs to protect them and to raise the water to a sufficient height. Damascus was supplied in like manner from the great fountain at Fijeh, and enjoyed the finest water supply of any city in the East. Near Solomon's Pools was a fountain whose waters were conveyed by a great acqueduct ten miles long, to Jerusalem, and that city, while depending largely upon its water cisterns, yet valued its springs very highly. These springs were, to a great extent, the result of volcanic agencies in earlier times.

In the Bible, the fountain is the symbol of physical refreshment and spiritual blessing, being a type of the free and abundant comforts which the Lord bestows upon his people. There are many of these wells or fountains that are very dear to all who hold the sacred record of Scripture in veneration, among them being the fountain of Nazareth, at which Mary may often have come with the other women of the village to draw water; Jacob's well on the slope of Gerizim near Sychar, where the Saviour asked for a drink; the "well by the gate" at Bethlehem of whose cooling waters David longed for a draught, when sore pressed by his foes; the well of Elisha near Jericho; "Philip's Fountain," on the highway to Gaza, where the eunuch was baptized, and the wells of Beersheba, in the wilderness, which recall the wanderings of Hagar.

Public fountains in Palestine are usually excavated from the solid limestone rock, as in the case of the "Apostles' Fountain." A few steps lead to the basin of stone, into which the stream pours its crystalline invitation to all who are athirst. One of the ancient gates of Jerusalem, the Fountain-Gate ("Sha ar h-A Yin"), which was in the first or oldest city wall, opened on the Valley of Hinnom, adjoining the Pool of Siloam, from which it derived its name. What the fountain is to the valleys and rocky uplands of Palestine, the wells are to the level plains. Many of these wells are over a hundred feet deep, and water is drawn either by the usual wooden vessel, on a rope attached to a wheel and pulley, by a "shadoof" (a long, slender pole which is raised or depressed at will), or by an ox or an ass working a primitive windlass. It is not improbable that some of the wells still in existence, were in use in the days of the patriarchs.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

CHRIST, THE STAR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Rev. 22: 16, "I am the bright and the morning star."

THIS is Christmas Eve. Our attention and the attention of the world is drawn to the star that pointed down to the caravansary whereChrist was born. But do not let us forget that Christ himself was a star. To that luminous fact my text calls us. It seems as if the natural world were anxious to make up for the damage it did our race in furnishing the forbidden fruit. If that fruit wrought death among the nations, now all the natural products shall become a symbol of blessing. The showering down of the wealth of the orchard will make us think of him whom Solomon describes as the apple tree among the trees of the wood; and the flowers of tangled glen and cultured parterre shall be the dew-glinted garland for the brow of the Lord Jesus. Yea, even the night shall be taxed, and its brightest star shall be set as a gem in the coronet of our holy religion.

Have you ever seen the morning star advantageously? If it was on your way home from a night's carousal, you saw none of its beauty. If you merely turned over on your pillow in the darkness, glancing out of the window, you know nothing about the cheerful influence of that star. But there are many in this house to-night, who in great passes of their life, some of them far out at sea, have gazed at that star and been thrilled through with indescribable gladness. That star comes trembling as though with the perils of the darkness, and yet bright with the anticipation of the day. It seems emotional with all tenderness, its eyes filled with the tears of many sorrows. It is the gem on the hand of the morning thrust up to signal its coming. Other stars are dim, like holy candles in a cathedral, or silver beads counted in superstitious litany; but this is a living star, a speaking star, an historic star, an evangelistic star—bright, and brilliant, and triumphant symbol of the great Redeemer. The telegraphic operator puts his finger on the silver key of the electric instrument, and the tidings fly across the continent; and so it seems to me that the finger of inspiration is placed upon this silver point in the heavens, and it thrills through all the earth: "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. Behold I am the bright and morning star." The meaning of my text is this: as the morning star precedes and promises the coming of the day, so Christ heralds the natural and spiritual dawn.

In the first place, Christ heralded the coming of the creation. There was a time when there was no order, no sound of beauty. No wing stirred. No word was uttered. No light sped. As far as God could look up, as far down, as far out, there was nothing. Immeasurable solitude. Heighth and depth, and length, and breadth of nothingness. Did Christ then exist? Oh, yes. "By him were all things made that are made; things in heaven and things in earth, and things under the earth." Yes, he antedated the creation. He led forth Arcturus and his sons He shone before the first morning. His voice was heard in the concert when the morning stars serenaded the advent of our infant earth, when, wrapped in swaddling clothes of light, it lay in the arms of the great Jehovah. He saw the first fountain laid. He saw the first light kindled. That hand which was afterward crushed upon the cross was thrust into chaos, and it brought out one world and swung it in that orbit; and brought out another world and swung it in another orbit; and brought out all the worlds, and swung them in their particular orbits. They came like sheep at the call of a shepherd. They knew his voice, and he called them all by their names. Oh, it is an interesting thought to me to know that Christ had something to do with the creation. I see now why it was so easy for him to change water into wine; he first created the water. I see now why it was so easy for him to cure the maniac; he first created the intellect. I see now why it was so easy for him to hush the tempest; he sank Gennesaret. I see now why it was so easy for him to swing fish into Simon's net; he made the fish. I see now why it was so easy for him to give sight to the blind man; he created the optic nerve. I see now why it was so easy for him to raise Lazarus from the dead; he created the body of Lazarus, and the rock that shut him in. Some suppose that Christ came a stranger to Bethlehem. Oh, no. He created the shepherds, and the flocks they watched, and the hills on which they pastured, and the heavens that overarched their heads,and the angels that chanted the chorus on that Christmas night. That hand, which was afterward nailed to the cross, was an omnipotent and creative hand, and the whole universe was poised on the tip of one of his fingers. Before the world was, Christ was. All the worlds came trooping up out of the darkness, and he greeted them, as a father greets his children, with a "good-morning," or a "good-night." Hail, Lord Jesus, morning star of the first creation.

Again, Christ heralds the dawn of comfort in a Christian soul. Sometimes we come to passes in life where all kinds of tribulations meet us. You are building up some great enterprise. You have built the foundation—the wall—you are just about to put on the capstone, when everything is demolished. You have a harp all strung for sweetest accord,and some great agony crushes it. There is a little voice hushed in the household. Blue eye closed Color dashed out of the cheek. The foot still. Instead of the quick feet in the hall, the heavy tread of those who march to the grave. Oh, what are people to do amid all these sorrows? Some sit down and mourn. Some bite their lip until the blood comes. Some wring their pale hands. Some fall on their faces. Some lie on their backs helpless, and look up into what seems to them an unpitying heaven. Some pull their hair down over their eyes, and look through with a fiend's glare. Some with both hands press their hot brain, and want to die, and cry: "O God! O God!" Long night, bitter night, stupendous night of the world's suffering! Some know not which way to turn. But not so the Christian man. He looks up toward the heavens. He sees a bright appearance in the heavens. Can it be only a flashing meteor? Can it be only a falling star? Can it be only a delusion? Nay, nay. The longer he looks, the more distinct it becomes, until, after a while,he cries out: "A star! a morning star! a star of comfort! a star of grace! a star of peace! the Star of the Redeemer!" Peace for all trouble. Balm for all wounds. Life for all dead. Now Jesus, the great heart-healer, comes into our home. Peace! Peace that passeth all understanding. We look up through our tears. We are comforted! It is the morning star of the Redeemer. "Who broke off that flower?" said one servant in the garden to another. "Who broke off that flower?" and the other servant said, "The master." Nothing more was said, for if the master had not a right to break off a flower to wear over his heart or to set in the vase in the mansion, who has a right to touch the flower? And when Christ comes down into our garden to gather lilies, shall we fight him back? Shall we talk as though he had no right to come? If any one in all the universe has a right to what is beautiful in our homes,then our Master has, and he will take it, and he will wear it over his heart, or he will set it in the vase of the palace eternal. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Peace,troubled soul! I put the balm on your wounded heart to-night. The morning star, the morning star of the Redeemer.

Again, Christ heralds the dawn of millennial glory. It is night in China,night in India, night in Siberia, night for the vast majority of the world's population. But it seems to me there are some intimations of the morning. All Spain is to be brought under the influence of the Gospel. What is that light I see breaking over the top of the Pyrenees? The morning! Yea,all Italy shall receive the Gospel. She shall have her schools, and her colleges, and her churches; her vast population shall surrender themselves to Christ. What is that light I see breaking over the top of the Alps? The morning. All India shall come to God. Her idols shall be cast down. Her Juggernauts shall be broken. Her temples of iniquity shall be demolished. What is that light I see breaking over the top of the Himalayas? The morning. The empurpled clouds shall gild the path of the conquering day. The Hottentot will come out of his mud hovel to look at the dawn; the Chinaman will come up on the granite cliffs, the Norwegian will get up on the rocks, and all the beach of heaven will be crowded with celestial inhabitants come out to see the sun rise over the ocean of the world's agony. They shall come from the east, and from the west,from the north, and from the south,and sit down in the kingdom of God. These sweltered under tropical suns. These shivered under Icelandic temperature. These plucked the vineyards in Italy. These packed the tea boxes in China. These were aborigines lifting up their dusky faces in the dawn. And the wind shall waft it, and every mountain shall become a transfiguration, and the sea will become the walking place of him who trod the wave cliffs of stormy Tiberias, and the song of joy shall rise toward heaven, and the great sky will become a sounding-board which shall strike back the shout of salvation to the earth until it rebounds again to the throne of the Almighty, and the morning star of Christian hope will become the full sunburst of millennial glory.

Again, Christ heralds the dawn of heaven upon every Christian's dying pillow. I suppose you have noticed that the characteristics of people in their healthy days are very apt to be their characteristics in their dying days. The dying words of ambitious Napoleon were: "Head of the army." The dying words of poetic Lord Byron were: "I must sleep now." The dying words of affectionate Lord Nelson were: "Kiss me, Hardy." The dying words of Voltaire were. as he saw one whom he supposed to be Jesus in the room: "Crush that wretch." But I have noticed that the dying words of Christians always mean peace. Generally the pain is all gone, and there is great quietude through the room. As one of these brothers told me of his mother in the last moment: "She looked up, and said, pointing to some supernatural being that seemed to be in the room, 'Look at that bright form. Why,they have come for me now.'"

The lattice is turned so that that the light is very pleasant. It is peace all around. You ask yourself, "Why, can this be a dying room? It is so different from anything I ever expected." And you walk the floor, and you look out of the window. and you come back and look at your watch,and you look at the face of the patient again, and there is no change, except that the face is becoming more radiant, more illuminated. The wave of death seems coming up higher and higher, until it has touched the ankle, then it comes on up until it touches the knee, and then it comes on up until it reaches the girdle, and then it comes on up until it reaches the lip, and the soul is about to be floated away into glory, and you roll back the patient's sleeve, and you put your finger on the pulse, and it is getting weaker and weaker,and the pulse stops, and you hardly know whether the life has gone or not. Indeed, you cannot tell when she goes away, she goes away so calmly. Perhaps it is four o'clock in the morning, and you have the bed wheeled around to the window, and the dying one looks out into the night sky, and she sees something that attracts her attention, and you wonder what it is.

Why, it is a star! It is a star that out of its silver rim is pouring a supernatural light into that dying experience. And you say, "What is it that you are looking at?" She says, "It is a star." You say, "What star is it that seems so well to please you?" "Oh," she says, "that is the morning star—Jesus!" I would like to have my death-bed under that evangelistic star—I would like to have my eye on that star, so I could be assured of the morning. Then the dash of the surf of the sea of death would only be the billowing up of the promise, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." All other lights will fail—the light that falls from the scroll of fame, the light that flashes from the gem in the beautiful apparel, the light that flames from the burning lamps of a banquet—but this light burns on and burns on. Paul kept his eye on that morning star, until he could say, "I am now ready to be offered and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course. I have kept the faith." Edward Payson kept his eye on that star until he could say, "The breezes of heaven fan me." Dr. Goodwin kept his eye on that evangelistic star until he could say, "I am swallowed up in God." John Tennant kept his eye on that evangelistic star until he could say, "Welcome, sweet Lord Jesus—welcome eternity." No other star ever pointed a mariner into so safe a harbor. No other star ever sunk its silvered anchor into the waters. No other star ever pierced such accumulated cloud, or beckoned with such a holy lustre.

With lanterns and torches, and a guide, we went down in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. You may walk fourteen miles and see no sunlight. It is a stupendous place. Some places the roof of the cave a hundred feet high. The grottoes filled with weird echoes, cascades falling from invisible height to invisible depth. Stalagmites rising up from the floor of the cave—stalactites descending from the roof of the cave, joining each other, and making pillars of the Almighty's sculpturing. There are rosettes of amethyst in halls of gypsum. As the guide carries his lantern ahead of you, the shadows have an appearance supernatural and spectral. The darkness is fearful. Two people, getting lost from their guide only for a few hours, years ago, were demented, and for years sat in their insanity. You feel like holding your breath as you walk across the bridges that seem to span the bottomless abyss. The guide throws his calcium light down into the caverns, and the light rolls and tosses from rock to rock, and from depth to depth, making at every plunge a new revelation of the awful power that could have made such a place as that.

A sense of suffocation comes upon you as you think that you are two hundred and fifty feet in a straight line from the sunlit surface of the earth. The guide, after awhile, takes you into what is called the "Star Chamber," and then he says to you: "Sit here," and then he takes the lantern and goes down under the rocks, and it gets darker and darker, until the night is so thick that the hand an inch from the eye is unobservable. And then by kindling one of the lanterns, and placing it in a cleft of the rock, there is a reflection cast on the dome of the cave, and there are stars coming out in constellations—a brilliant night heavens—and you involuntarily exclaim: "Beautiful! beautiful!" Then he takes the lantern down in other depths of the cavern, and wanders on, and wanders off, until he comes up from behind the rocks gradually, and it seems like the dawn of the morning and it gets brighter and brighter. The guide is a skilled ventriloquist, and he imitates the voices of the morning, and soon the gloom is all gone, and you stand congratulating yourself over the wonderful spectacle. Well, there are a great many people who look down into the grave as a great cavern. They think it is a thousand miles subterraneous, and all the echoes seem to be the voices of despair, and the cascades seem to be the falling tears that always fall, and the gloom of earth seems coming up in stalagmite, and the gloom of the eternal world seems descending in the stalactite, making pillars of indescribable horror. The grave is no such place at that to me, thank God. Our divine guide takes us down into the great caverns, and we have the lamp to our feet and the light to our path, and all the echoes in the rifts of the rock are anthems, and all the falling waters are fountains of salvation, and, after awhile, we look up, and behold! the cavern of the tomb has become a King's star-chamber. And, while, we are looking at the pomp of it, an everlasting morning begins to rise, and all the tears of earth crystallize into stalagmite, rising up in a pillar on the one side, and all the glories of heaven seem to be descending in stalactite, making a pillar on the other side, and you push against the gate that swings between the two pillars, and, as the gate flashes open, you find it is one of the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. Blessed be God that through this Gospel the mammoth cave of the sepulchre has become the illumined Star Chamber of the King!

I would God that if my sermon to-day does not lead you to Christ, that before morning, looking out of the window, the astronomy of the night heavens might lead you to the feet of Jesus.

Hark! hark! to God the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem;
But [illegible] the Saviour speaks—
Is the Star of Bethlehem.

Aunt Hannah.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

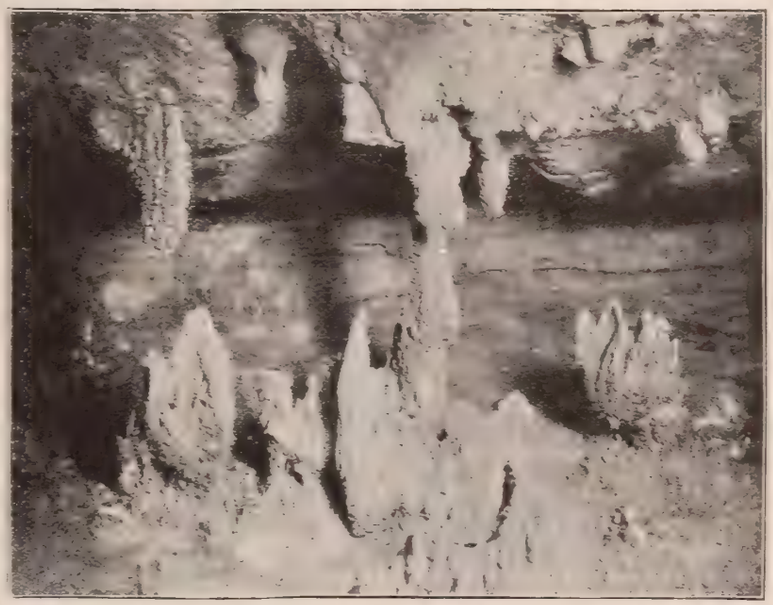
OWING to the illness of Rev. Henry Hopeful, pastor of Harmony Church, the Rev. Darius Doleful, D.D., will preach on next Sunday morning at the usual hour. There will be no preaching in the evening, but the Young People's Society will hold its regular meeting at 6:30 in the Lecture-room."

Sabbath morning came, and with its came the pastor's substitute. He was well named, for never was seen a more doleful face and walk, nor heard a more doleful voice. His sermon was shadow and no sunshine, all gloom and no gleam, all midnight and no mid-day, all fear and no faith, all tremble and no triumph, all groping and no glory. He paved the road to heaven with trials, curbed it with tribulations, crooked it with temptations, hedged it with briars, and overshadowed it with sorrows. He closed with the following words to the young people:

"Remember each day, you are on the way to the grave, and laughter ill becomes any one who may die any day. In the midst of funerals, no one of you should be cheerful; it will be time enough to laugh and be cheerful when you get to heaven. It is a very solemn thing to live, and only religion makes life endurable. I commend to you a religion that has made me what I am, and what it has done for me it can do for each of this company of young people I see here this morning. Let us pray." The close of the sermon found the congregation much nearer the North Pole than the Cape of Good Hope; old and young shivered, and the church seemed to be filled with fog. A look of disgust was seen on Father Trustful's wrinkled face, and dear old mother Brightside looked daggers at the D.D. who had brought them anything but "good tidings of great joy." But the fog disappeared, the frost melted and the faces of the young people brightened, when Uncle Caleb Cheerful arose and said: "The young people of the church are requested to meet at my home this evening instead of the Lecture-room, as Aunt Hannah has a large consignment of sunshine she wishes to bestow upon her children. Come wearing your brightest smiles, and prepared to sing your gladdest songs of praise."

The doleful benediction could not dissipate the effect of Uncle Caleb's announcement, and it was plain to be seen the young people's meeting would be well attended that evening. No one was better known, or better loved in the community than Aunt Hannah. Early in her married life, her hip had been broken by a runaway accident, and since then she had been a cripple. Her fractured limb she called her "means of grace," and certainly that or something else, had developed a most wonderful Christian character. No one ever heard her complain, but all who knew her had heard her rejoice. Her face was a sunbeam, and her voice was sunshine set to music.

The house was well lighted that evening as the young people flocked in, and Aunt Hannah seated in her easy chair, greeted each with a bright smile and a cheery word. The house soon rang with soulful song, and never did the Ninety-first Psalm bring a greater benediction than it did that night, as Aunt Hannah read it with her tuneful voice. Tears filled many eyes, but they were tears of joy. She spoke of the love of God—a love that fire cannot burn, water cannot drown, winds cannot blow away, sorrow cannot crush, and death cannot kill. Her eyes gleamed and her voice shone—and in her, they had the embodiment of Divine love in a human soul. Earth and heaven met in that house that night, and the very angels must have bent low to hear the words of testimony that fell from scores of young lips. Aunt Hannah's advice for them to "get good, be good, do good," thrilled them through and through. Midnight, shadow, darkness, gloom—none of these things were there, but light, love, hope—God. Aunt Hannah could not go out to visit the sick, comfort the afflicted, cheer the desolate, seek the lost, but they could and they would. "Look up—Lift up" was the motto of these young people; they had a big look up that evening and that meant a big lift up. That dear saint with the love-lit face was more than Aunt Hannah to them now—she was a benediction and an inspiration. "In His Name" who had made her what she was, they resolved to go forth and "Lend a hand." The world was to feel the thrill of a new touch from young hands and hearts set on fire by love. Sorrow, death, funerals, and graves, could not overshadow the noon-tide glory that had come to them in that hallowed place on that Sabbath evening. The cheerful ending shut out the doleful beginning of that day, and Rev. Darius Doleful, D.D., passed away as a dismal dream, while Aunt Hannah Cheerful remained as a God-given reality.



A GROTTO IN THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

"FROM MANGER TO THRONE."

OH! dreary path through a sin-cursed land,
For one so gentle and true;
Through poverty's den and desert sand,
And ways where the wild thorn grew:
Where eyes from pitiless hearts looked on,
Seeing the Manger but not the Throne.

Who shall go over those blood-stained ways,
Though ages have gone since then,
And drop no tear for the tale of days
That never can come again:
When the sweet Christ-heart for the old world bled,
And heaven's glory on earth was shed.

Heroes of time have left the throne.
And perished in dust at last:
But He began where no rank was known,
And upward through sorrow passed:
Wondrous achievement, Satan defied,
Mankind redeemed, and God satisfied.

From Manger to Throne with earth lights few,
And darkness sometimes above,
Who shall measure what Christ went through
To finish that march of love:
And who will follow the path he trod,
Now it is light, and it leads to God?

The Gospel in Ceylon.

Mary and Margaret Leitch write of the Progress of their Medical Mission.

READERS of this journal will doubtless remember the history published some time ago in our columns of the excellent Christian work among the Tamils now being done by Misses Mary and Margaret Leitch. Since their return to their field of labor at Chavakacheri, in the northern province of Ceylon, these devoted ladies have been successful in establishing a Medical Mission with general headquarters at Manippay. They now write as follows:

"We believe the Medical Mission Agency will be the best possible means toward overcoming opposition to the Gospel here, the missionaries going to the people in the times of their greatest need, and preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ not by words alone, but by a loving, benevolent, Christ-like ministry performed in his name and for his sake. Dr. and Mrs. Scott, who recently went to Ceylon to take charge of this particular work, have treated about eight hundred different cases in the first two and a half months since their arrival. It might interest you to hear of a few of these cases in detail.

"One man named Arumugam, who came for treatment, when he heard of the power of Jesus Christ as a present Saviour, took off the silver charm from his arm and broke it in two, and gave it to be sold for old silver. He now attends the Christian Church in the village where he lives. In the case of another man, named Kanthar, an operation was performed by Dr. Scott, removing one of his eyeballs which had been for a long time diseased, and had been causing him great pain. While in the hospital this patient heard of Christ and declared his belief in him and his determination from this time forward to live as a Christian and to educate and bring up his children as Christians. His wife is friendly to Christianity.

"Another case treated was that of a girl named Veyalalchi, who was severely injured by the fall of a heavy well sweep. She was brought to the hospital insensible. About ten women and fifteen men of her relatives and acquaintances came with her, greatly distressed at her condition. While they were waiting to to see if the treatment given by the doctor would prove helpful, the Catechist, Mr. Fitch, read and explained to them the narrative of the raising of Jairus's daughter, and prayed earnestly to the same ever-present loving Saviour for the recovery of this child. The relatives were much comforted, and now that the child has made a good recovery, they are much impressed by this cure and deeply grateful to the doctors for the kinkness shown and help given.

"A Brahmin, from one of the Hindu temples, lately came to the hospital for treatment. At first when the Catechist was reading aloud to him from the Bible, he was unwilling to listen, and declared that he was not a sinner. But when the first chapter of Romans was read and explained, he confessed that though not outwardly, yet in his heart he was sinful. He has now accepted a copy of the New Testament, and has read nineteen chapters with interest, and says that he will read the whole book through. His wife is with him, and listens attentively to the reading and conversations.

"Several young men, connected with the Hindu Society formed to oppose Christianity are now coming to the dispensary as patients. They confess that the sinful lives they have been leading have destroyed their health and happiness. One of these young men, a teacher in the Hindu High School, was brought to Dr. Scott in chains, having lost his reason. He is now sane and greatly benefited by the treatment. Many are hearing day by day in song and story the glad tidings of him who came to seek and to save that which was lost."

THE BIBLE IN JAPAN.

In 1859 there was not a convert in Japan. In 1884 there were nearly 7,000. In [illegible] there were no copies of the Bible, but in 1883 57,593 parts of the Bible and 20,368 Bibles or Testaments were distributed. There were two weekly papers with a circulation of 2,700 each in 1884. In 1886 there were about 100 Evangelical churches in Japan, 20 of which were self-supporting, and 10 others of which received no foreign aid. There were also schools and colleges and a number of seminaries. In 1892 there were about 200 churches in Japan.

THE FIRST ADAM.

S.S. Lesson for Jan. 7. Gen. 1: 26-2:3. Golden Text, Gen. 1: 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"IN the beginning God created." These inspired words bar the past, there is no getting behind them farther than: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." (John 1: 1-3). Christ is God, and God created. Christ is the Word, and "by the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. . . For he spake, and it was done; he commanded and it stood fast." "He is before all things and by him all things consist."

Thus, whatever may be the theories of modern science about the origin of man, we have God's word for it that man is no exception to the rest of the creation. In the beginning of man, as of the vegetable and animal, God created. He is the one universal Source. "In him was life." Yet there was a great and marked distinction between God's creation of the lower orders of being and of man, his master work. The Holy Trinity must needs hold a special council before man was created:

"Let us make Man in our image after our likeness." All else in the wonders of God's creation was to be separate from God; now he would take upon himself the responsibility of bringing into existence a being which should represent him, which should answer to him, which should possess possibilities of communion and even oneness with him. In a significant passage after the Psalmist has described the powerlessness of idols, "They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not; they have ears but they hear not; noses have they, but they smell not; they have hands, but they handle not; neither speak they through their throat"—he adds: "They that make them are like unto them and so is every one that trusteth in them." The idol-maker and the idol-worshipper are helpless, useless, senseless as the idols of their making; and God would have his worshippers like him. They make their gods, and so degrade themselves to their level: our God makes us to exalt us to his level. And though indeed Jeremiah says: "There is none like unto thee, O Lord," yet God's purpose to make man like himself has never been abandoned: "I know that whatever God doeth, it shall be forever." Frustrated in a measure, and for a time, through the fall, and through the sin of man, yet God's purpose comes out again in Redemption, and he who first created man in his own image after his likeness, now makes all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose; for whom he foreknew he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. (Rom. 8: 28, 29.)

As with Israel, "God hath not cast off his people whom he foreknew." They are not all Israel which are of Israel; but there is according to the election of grace. "Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." So it is with God's creation of man. There were Jews and many of them, who did not prize their calling; they chose idols; as a people they departed from the Lord; and he, leaving them to their idolatry went on with his purposes accomplishing in the elect remnant who responded to him that which the people as a nation re- [illegible] created him: Jesus the express image of the person of God the Father has been despised and rejected by man, he has seen no beauty in him to desire him. His coming again is treated by the majority of men with scorn and ridicule; he is not wanted in the world which he created. The King of the Jews was unwelcomed by man at his birth, cast out and crucified by the creatures whom he came to save. But the general rejection of Christ did not prevent his dealing with a remnant, whom he is most surely conforming to his mage according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself.

"And let them have dominion." The likeness to God was to be not only a representation like a picture or a statue, which, as a thing dead and powerless in itself, only serves its purpose to bring to memory something else which has life and power. The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and then breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul. He imparted his own life to man—in him was life, and he gave of his dominion to man. As he is infinitely man's Superior, so he constituted man the superior in the whole creation; he authorized man to represent him and reign for him, by virtue of his creation in the image of God, he invested man with regal power: "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet." (Ps. 8: 5, 6.) And in redemption he makes us a kingdom of priests unto God. It is just in measure as man is like God that he has and man becomes like God as he contemplates him. We all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, R. V. with unveiled face reflecting as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, "are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord," or R.V. are "transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit." Reflecting or beholding! We cannot behold in a mirror without being reflected, we cannot be reflected full face without beholding. A man who lives always full face towards God turns by this reflection God's face, reflected in him towards the world. Dominion has always been God's thought for man, but since the fall, dominion comes through submission as death comes through life. As Jesus, the last Adam must die, and make a way through death to everlasting life for man, so Jesus, the last Adam, must take his Father's yoke upon him, and become "meek and lowly of heart," that he might re-establish man's dominion in his own Person, and make the way for us to be meek and lowly in heart, and having overcome as he overcame to sit with him upon his throne, as he is set down with his Father upon his throne.

It is good to be taken back to our origin, and reminded how and for what we were created. And it is good to remember how all creation was made out of nothing, "things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." "In the beginning God created" is all we can ever know about it. And even so in his wondrous work on those whom he is conforming to the image of his Son, our God must first reduce to nothing that he may create, "created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works;" "the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness:" created, not developed; created, not improved. Are we willing to be that we may be created anew? Are we willing to be conscious of our unimportance, of our uselessness in ourselves, of our utter failure to have dominion by any power or gift of our nature? Are we willing for others to see in us the fall of the first Adam, to be in our own person a witness that all flesh is as grass, and all the goodliness thereof as the flower of grass?

"So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him male and female created he them, and God blessed them and said unto them: Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it, and have dominion." In all God's creation there was to be the power of reproduction, life was to bring forth life, the herb was to yield seed, the fruit tree to bring forth fruit whose seed was in itself, for further fruitfulness. And so with man: "Be fruitful and multiply;" the first Adam and the last Adam; for "he shall see his seed." Life always seeks for room to reproduce itself: it is the instinct of spiritual life to reproduce itself, to seek other souls; when this instinct is wanting, the true life is wanting.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

JUDICIOUS teachers will render a service to their classes, which may protect them from the shafts of infidelity, by pointing out the difference that exists between science and religion. The important difference is that while man can gain scientific knowledge by observation, experiment and reason, he cannot, unaided, attain certainty in religious truth. For religion, he needs a revelation and God has given it to him in the Bible. The object of the book is to reveal God to men and teach them how to live so as to please him. The Bible was not given to teach science and men misunderstand its purpose when they go to it for scientific knowledge. If this fact is realized, the teacher will have less difficulty in dealing with the questions which will probably be put to him about the lesson of the day. If the Bible had been given to teach science, these early chapters of Genesis would have been filled with histories of the long process by which the world was fitted for the habitation of the human race. Science has a great deal to say about these processes and it has not, even at this late day, arrived at absolute certainty in regard of them. The Bible has nothing to say of them. It tells us all that it is necessary to its purpose. It says God created the world and the sun and the stars. Science does no more than tell us how he made them. It admits that back of all the processes, the traces of which it finds written in the rocks, there must have been in the beginning some potent life-giving force. It cannot tell what that force was, but the Bible tells us that it was God: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." It was this fact that we needed to know. We might have inferred it, but certainty on this point was given at the opening of the Bible story, that we might understand all that was to follow. The conception of the successive acts of creation, described in the first two chapters of Genesis, was current in the early years of human history. Tablets have been found in Assyria and Egypt which formed part of national libraries, which when deciphered contain accounts largely parallel to the Biblical narrative. A picture of one of these tablets, now in the British Museum, is given on this page. They appear to have been written on soft clay, with a sharp pointed instrument, and afterward baked, to render the writing permanent. They differ from the Biblical narrative chiefly in ascribing the creation to many Gods. In teaching the lesson of the day, it will be wise to follow the example of the Bible writers and, avoiding scientific questions, deal with the supreme fact that God made man. As an eminent writer has said, the statement is one that taxes our faith. When we see a drunkard, or a vicious man, or a fierce murderer, we are more disposed to think that the devil made man. But we are assured that God made him and in his own image. But what is God's image? Not our outward form, for God is a spirit. Then it must be the spirit which is in God's image. And we find that it is so. There are traits of nobility, of aspiration after better things, of discontent with mere animal life, which convince us that the Bible statement is true; and when man allows the spiritual nature within him to rule in his being, when God's Spirit restores the lost powers and he becomes a new creature in Christ, then we see God in him and realize that God made him. He is capable of so much good, that only God could have made him.

TABLET GIVING ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION.

In our image. To live in sin is to deface and debase the image of God. It does dishonor to him as well as injures the sinner. It is related of Theodoric, king of the Goths, that he saw a base coin in circulation and at once seized it and taking it away, he summoned his chief officers before him and demanded of them an accounting. He asked indignantly why such a coin as the one he produced had been issued. He was informed that the finances of the nation were crippled and that it had not been possible to obtain enough silver for the coinage. "Then," said he, "stop coining, I will not have my image on debased coin. You disgrace your king."

God blessed them. There is the secret of the Godlike in man. It is God in him. That so many fallen, sinful, ignorant men become after their conversion noble, amiable, courageous, and useful, is because God has made them his instruments. He often chooses for the purpose some who seem unfit for his use, passing by the learned and cultivated, and choosing the humble and childlike. It is related of Paganini, the greatest of violinists, that he was announced to play before an august assemblage. His enemies had disparaged him, declaring that he yas not so great a musician as people supposed. Just before he went into the presence of the audience they took away his favorite instrument, a well-seasoned perfect Cremona violin. Paganini was convulsed with rage. It was a plot, a scheme to ruin him. Gradually he became calm, and taking a common violin from one of the men in the orchestra, began to play his exquisite music. He was heard to mutter, "they shall see that the music is not in the violin; the music is in me."

It was very good and the evening and the morning were the sixth day. How long these days were we are not told. In another part of the Bible we are told that "a thousand years are with the Lord as one day." It may be that the days were much longer than that. They were as long as God needed them to be for his work. At their termination God surveyed it and pronounced it very good. It is so in human work. The best work and the most is done in six day periods. It has been proved repeatedly that in countries where the Lord's day is observed the average weekly production of the men surpasses in quantity and quality that of the men in countries where it is not observed. Each man will turn out more and better work in six days in the one case, than his rival does in seven days in the other case.

He rested on the seventh day. God, who made man, knew that periodical rest was necessary to his well-being and he fixed the law of seven day periods. Attempts have been made, notably at the time of the French Revolution, to change the length of the periods. The French decided that every week should have ten days, as being more convenient for decimal calculation, but the change failed because it was contrary to the laws of nature which are the laws of God. An effort was being made in a certain city by some politicians, who posed as the friends of the workingmen, to have the museums and places of amusement opened on Sunday. They said the workingmen could not go there on week-days, and it was unjust that the places should be closed on the only day they could go. Petitions were drawn up and sent to factories and shops to be signed. The result disappointed the organizers of the movement. Large numbers refused to sign. In one of the printing houses the foreman went as a deputation to his employer and asked if the men were required to sign. "No," said the employer. "I suppose they will wish to do so, but they may do as they like." The man replied: "No, they object to sign. They think that these places cannot be opened without men being required to attend to them and that is not fair. Also they think that a movement of this kind will end in all workingmen being required to work on Sunday, too. They cannot afford to run the risk of that, for Sunday rest is necessary to life."

WELCOMED BACK TO GABOON.

Missionary Nassau Begins the Third Decade of his Gospel Work in Africa—An Earnest Native Inquirer.

SEVERAL months ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a sketch of the remarkable Gospel work of Rev. Robt. Hamill Nassau, an American missionary and physician, who has spent over twenty years of his life among the native tribes of the West Coast of Africa. Dr. Nassau was then in this country on his vacation. Since his return to Africa, he has written to Rev. I. H. Polhemus and the fellow-workers of the church in Orange, N. J., which supports his missionary work in Africa, a letter from which we are privileged to make the following extracts:

We parted on July 2nd I sailed from Philadelphia July 12th, reached Liverpool July 24th, visited relatives in England during three weeks, sailed from Liverpool August 16th, stopping at Los Palmas, Grand Canary, at Freetown, Sierra Leone, at four points on the Liberian coast, at Accra, at Lagas, at Old Calabar, at Rio Del Rey, at Fernando Po., at Victoria, at Cameroon, at Batanga at Bata, Elobi, and finally here on September 22nd.

I was welcomed by two fellow-missionaries, Mr. E. A. Ford and Rev. W. S. Bannerman, and his two-year boy, Harold. The approach of steamers up the Gaboon Bay (or estuary) is observed an hour before they actually reach their anchorage. I was expected on that steamer "Cameroon," so the mission boat was rowed along-side promptly on the dropping of the anchor, it having left shore as soon as the steamer had been sighted. I did not know Mr. Ford; he had joined the mission while I was in America. He is a lay missionary, having charge of the mission finances. Mr. Bannerman was my successor at Talaguga two and one-half years ago. But the two Ogove Stations, Kangwe and Talaguga, having since been transferred to the care of the French Protestant Society, he had just come from the Ogove, on his way to take charge of the vacant station. Angoni, on the Nkama River (an affluent of the Gaboon, generally misspelled "Como.") His little Harold had been born after I went to America. I looked with tender interest on the child, as I now look eagerly on any white child, for the sake of my little daughter Mary, and especially because Harold was the second white child to be born at Talaguga. Like my own little girl, who spoke the native language freely as her native tongue before she learned English, Harold was talking a mixture of Bantu, French and English.

The name of our mission house in this Gaboon settlement is Baraka. Besides Mr. Ford and myself, there are here a widow lady, the senior member of our mission, Mrs. Ogden, and a Swiss gentleman, Mr. Presset, teacher of the school. He speaks French, as that language is required to be taught; but he speaks also English and the native Mpongwe. We three board with Mrs. Ogden.

On the Monday after my arrival (September 25), Mr. and Mrs. B. were going to their new station Angoni, seventy miles up the river, An English trading firm, Hatton & Cookson, have a small steamer, the "Move," (a German name), on which we were given passage. This vessel does not ply regularly; it goes only as the trading firm requires for the collection of native trade produce from its up-river sub-station. Hereafter in my letters I will use the word we commonly use here, "Factory," meaning trading-house. It is the word used all along this coast. It means the same as "Agency" in the Hudson Bay fur trade. But, because an "agent" is a "factor," his dwelling or shop is called a "factory." Do not misunderstand me then in the future when I speak of a "factory." There are no manufacturers here.

We left about 10 A.M. On the way passed Parrot Island, where in the breeding months of February and March, there are hundreds of the African grey, red-tailed and red-winged parrots. You rarely see them in America. All the parrots you see in America come from Brazil. There are none of these grey and red parrots in Brazil, I think. On my visits to America, I have always brought some of these parrots as gifts to my friends; but I try first to find out whether they like parrots. For my own part, I do not like them; they are so noisy. Same way, monkeys can easily be obtained here; but I would not, for my own part, own one.

Another island on the way was Konig Island, a name remaining from the Dutch occupation of this region almost one hundred years ago, when slaves were exported. On that island are the remains of an old earth-work and cannon used in the slave-trading days. Further up the river, we passed an extension of the French Roman Catholic Mission, at a place called Dongila. The Roman Catholics have two large schools for boys and girls here at this Gaboon settlement (which the French call "Libreville," so, if in future, I speak of Libreville, you will know that I mean Gaboon). Dongila is their extension, some fifteen miles up the river. We have a licentiate teacher, Iguwi, at Ovendo Point, some five miles up the river. And, formerly, there was a mission station, Nengenenge, some sixty miles up; but the little island on which it was built was low, muddy and surrounded by the unhealthy mangrove tree swamps. It was removed more than a dozen years ago, ten miles farther up, by Rev. A. W. Marling, to a Fang town called Fula, and he named his house Angoni, which means in the Fang dialect, "Peace" or "Friendship," because those cannibal Fangs, like mine at Talaguga, on the Ogowe River, were always quarreling and fighting.

The Gaboon Estuary ends at Negenenge; it is the head of the bay, like Bay-Head on your East Jersey coast. Into it flow several small streams The largest two are the Bakwe and the Nkama (or Como). It is ten miles up the latter that we were to go to Angoni. But the Nkama being narrow, the steamer lay at Negenenge all night, waiting for daylight. When, next morning, I had aided Mr. and Mrs. Bannerman and little Harold ashore to their new home, the steamer bore me away, down the river to the mouth of another affluent, the Rembeve, and up it to a town Agonjo, where formerly we had a native Bible-reader. As the steamer was to lie there all night, and as the sleeping accommodations on it were very poor, (as the vessel does not profess to carry passengers, and consequently cannot be blamed for having no place for them), I went ashore to pass the night in a comfortable native house, belonging to a native trader. The trade is in ivory, india rubber, gum and bamboo-palm fibre (for making brooms in England.) My long residence in Africa has made my name known, even where I have not myself been. The man showed me to his best room, with civilized bed and bedding, kerosene light, etc. One of his assistants, who could read, having been taught here at Gaboon. He was a young man, not a professing Christian, and his wife was an inquirer, enrolled on the list of catechumens of this church—of course, at once, she was one of the "lambs" after whom I was to look.

I conversed with her and gave her pastoral advice. I do not know why I did not offer to pray with her; but, for not doing so, I felt justly rebuked by her (not that she at all intended it), in the following incident: It seemed a very unlikely place for a prayer-meeting. Indeed, there were only those four persons in the house. So, being tired, I proposed going to bed, and did not, as is my usual custom, call together the household for family prayer. This young inquirer, Ogandaga by name, took up the lamp to lead me to my room. She set it on the table. I bade her good night, after she had hospitably examined the pillows and covers, to see that there were no centipedes or scorpions there. I supposed she was leaving the room and sat down, beginning to take off my shoes and stockings. She remained, fussing about the table. Presently I observed that her fussing was only a getting up of courage to say, "Shan't we have prayer together?" Verily, I was rebuked! Slipping into my shoes and coat, I stepped with her out again into the sitting-room, and she passed out-doors, returning in a few minutes with some ten persons. Of course, then, I had a fifteen minute prayer-meeting with those heathens, reading from a portion of the native Scripture which her husband possessed. She cannot read. So, again I bade them good night, and again she carried the lamp for me, and again I began to disrobe, and again the bashful face looked up, saying, "But—about—my catechism?" And she placed in my hands her copy of a little question book, which we have compiled for the instruction of inquirers. Again my heart smote me, and again I returned to the sitting-room, and I spent a solid hour asking the now happy and satisfied Ogandaga, the hundred questions of this little book. Her husband, though not a Christian, had helped her to learn them, and she answered most of them with little prompting from me. Thus, many who have been in our schools, and who have not professed conversion, are assisting in spreading the truth.

I returned with the steamer on the Thursday night, September 28. I held session meeting with the three native elders on Friday, from 2 P.M. to 5 P.M. We held preparatory service at 3 P.M. of Saturday, September 30, and on Saturday afternoon I preached in Mpongwe, on John 21: 22, "Follow thou me." An excommunicated woman was restored, one suspended woman was restored, the wife of one of the elders was baptized and received to the table, her baby girl Ngwanji, and another baby, infant boy of another member, were baptized, and some fifty of us sat down to the table.

"BUT-ABOUT-MY-CATECHISM?" SAID THE WOMAN.

I think this letter must close here. Descriptions of our Sabbath services, of our weekly meetings, and of a communion Sabbath will find a place in future letter.

Our Sunday School Missionary's Journal of an Extended Tour in the Southwest.

FROM THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School missionary in the Southwest, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, comes the following most interesting record of a tour among the schools and churches which he has planted in his extensive territory during the past three years:

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., Nov. 16, 1893.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Obedient to calls, I have been visiting many country schools and churches to see how they are doing. Early in the Spring, I made several tours into a distant part of my field, seeking mainly to organize new schools, and along the route reviving and reorganizing feeble ones. But serious and protracted illness in my family forced me to return home frequently. And soon came the panic in money matters. Never have I known such a stringency in this part of the state. It has been a monetary paralysis, depressing every material and business interest, not excepting the Sunday Schools. Many Schools failed to supply themselves with necessary current literature. Calls came to me from many parts to visit weak and discouraged schools.

The following notes, in the form of a journal will bring the work clearly before your readers, omitting dates for brevity's sake. The initials refer to school houses, except where churches are named. The notes are given as illustrations, not the entire report of recent tours:

M. Z. House well filled to hear the address; the school had been meeting [illegible]. God bless it. Word to many.

P. R. School prospering: an aged woman spoke thus to the school: "I have wanted to stand before you and tell the good this school is doing. It is what led to see where I stood as a sinner. I am now a Christian, am old and ready for the grave. I intend to serve the Lord the rest of my days." Blessed be God, these schools reach, not the young only, but the aged as well! There have been many conversions, and a great change for the better, in this neighborhood since I first visited them.

U. B. Church, school small but fairly prosperous: addressed them at night. We were blessed: three arose for prayer—a married woman, a young lady and a boy.

R. R. Attendance and attention good, and much interest; two young men asked prayer, one especially prominent and influential. But of an irreligious family. They have a beautiful new school house, far better than the old one.

U. T. Church, the house just finished, near two school houses where I organized schools several years ago in very needy districts; one hundred dollars was lacking to pay the church house; out of debt to-day, which I helped to raise by an appeal, after which the house was dedicated. The superintendents of the two schools I had organized were present and contributed to the new church. One of them said: "The school you organized at G. R. had a revival for eight years. I remember I told you the day before that I would not be superintendent. You told me to pray over that." The next day Sunday he accepted the position, with the above result.

At S. J. Church, a beautiful frame instead of a poor old school house when I was there before. It was a joyful sight to see so many interesting young people; here, as at other places many promised to meet me in heaven. Next day visited and prayed with an aged and afflicted Christian; at night at B., good attendance and interest, precious meeting, school prosperous. Day following back at S. J. Church, attended Sunday School and preached in the A. M.; a lovely sight to see so many aged men and women and young people, so neat and agreeable in appearance and manner; received the names of about thirty interested about their souls.

At H., Sunday night, good attendance and interest; much infidelity here. At the urgent request of an aged disciple of 77 years, left an appointment for Tuesday night.

At F. Monday night, a poor house with broken window lights, chilly; there was a dance at a farm house near by, but the audience filled our house so that numbers stood through the service and the organization of a prosperous school. Tuesday night back to H., and preached to large audiences.

At every place, I believe the Holy Spirit directed and blessed the Word, and very manirestly and powerfully at many. The course pursued with inquirers at different places was to instruct them publicly in a body, and privately, as far as I could, praying with them, and finally furnishing Scripture references and Gospel tracts.

I am very thankful to the donors who are so kindly helping this work, and for the kind letters and cards received, and though, through pressure of work, I have not always been able to answer these, I want to assure every writer that all encouraging words are read, as far as received, with sincere gratitude.

WORSE THAN PUGILISM.

AGAIN and again all decent people have been shocked at the reports of prize-fights, but these encounters do not seem to me so objectionable as war on a large scale. It is a bad thing to have one jaw broken and a few drops of blood shed; but is not that less distressing than to break a thousand jaws and cover miles of territory with the signs of carnage? If the world must fight, I prefer the fight on a small scale. Why not, instead of a Zulu War, in which thousands of Englishmen and Zulus are put to death, compel a Disraeli, after he has instituted the war, to go forth to meet a responsible Zulu and have two battered and bruised men instead of ten thousand? Instead of France and Germany turning their empires into cemeteries and covering Europe with bereavement, have a champion Frenchman and a champion German some day go out like these gladiators and decide the contest? That would be a great economy of bones and a great economy of blood and a great economy of tears and a great economy of heartaches and a great economy of sepulchres. Besides that, a fight with fists develops more courage than a conflict in which the usual weaponry of international strife is employed. A man may be a successful general without much personal courage, for he can stand in a tower two miles from the fight and give orders, or may sit in a stone house incognito, smoking his cigar, and receiving messages from a battle-field three miles away, where hundreds of private soldiers are being sacrificed. There is not so much exposure in a contest in which Dahlgren guns and howitzers and "swamp angels" and all weapons of long range are engaged as when two men with nothing but their own fists come close up and pound each other's faces into a jelly, obliterating the image in which God made them. Beside that, in the last style of combat there are no bereavements; at any rate, there can be only two deaths, and what is that to an Austerlitz, or a Sedan, or a Gettysburg, leaving twenty or forty thousand homes in widowhood and orphanage? Mind you, I do not advocate pugilism; but I abhor it far less than war, whose epics never cease to sing, and whose drums never cease to roll, by as much as two mutilated men are less horrifying than thirty thousand stacked up corpses.

I [illegible] the good Lord hasten it—when all individual quarrels will be settled by arbitration, and an international difference will be settled by treaty; but until then, I am in favor of compelling those who get up wars to do their own fighting. If in this country some great Northern man and some great Southern man shall by angry agitation bring on a war between two sections, let those two men be compelled to be the champions, and meet on the banks of the Potomac, and have it out in eight or ten rounds of patriotic pugilism, and if they should both expire under the bruising, the loss would not be much. How many lives and how much suffering would have been saved if Napoleon and Wellington in Franco-English war, and Moltke and McMahon in Franco-German war, had fought out the battle alone. You say that in some cases the physical disparity might be too great. Then let the nations of the earth choose two champions sufficiently athletic. But it would not depend on physical stature. A small man in the right is stronger than a large man in the wrong. You remember David and Goliah. While the world has made advances in arts of peace, I doubt whether it has made any advance beyond the old style of championship in war. The trouble is that those who get up the wars usually stay at home and make money out of the Government contracts, while the farmers and the mechanics, who had nothing to do in creating the trouble, have to leave their plows and their workbenches and go forth to suffer. In the prize-fight two men are the ruffians. In the strife between nations two Governments are the desperadoes. The music written in staffs and clefs of light above Bethlehem on the first Christmas night needs more thorough rehearsal by all nations. The only difference between a war with fists and a war with cannon and sabre and explosion of powder mine is that the last is the more destructive and the more wicked. The only war to be cherished is the war of argument, the war of facts, the war of mind against mind—that uplifts, that irradiates, that is the friend of civilization and Christianity; that kind of conflict meets the approval of the God who says in the Bible, "Come, let us reason together."

HONEST FAILURE.

WHEN a man fails in business he is always blamed, always misrepresented, always pursued, always made miserable, unless he has the Eternal God to fall back upon. You suppose yourself to be a man of integrity and a Christian. You have that idea of yourself. I have the same idea in regard to you. But you fail to-morrow in business, and I will prove from some who now pretend to be your friends that you are a defaulter, a hypocrite, an unmitigated scoundrel—in a word, that you ought to be either imprisoned or hung. You get going down hill and I will find fifty people glad to help you in the descent and act as cheerful pallbearers and gravediggers at your financial obsequies. That which I hear against men when they are unfortunate makes no impression on my mind. The atmosphere gets malarialized with an infernalism which rejoices in the overthrow of a financier, and the higher he is up the greater the happiness of some people when he comes down. There is one healthful Christian mood in which at such times you and I ought to stand, and that is of intense, enlarged, prayerful Christian sympathy. Put the best phase on every man's misfortune you can. Do not call it a rascality when it may have been only a mistake. Divide up among many the condemnation which you were tempted to put upon one or two or three.

HUMBLE INSTRUMENTS.

CHRIST sympathizes with our poor efforts at doing good. Our work often does not seem to amount to much. We teach a class, or distribute a bundle of tracts, or preach a sermon, and we say, "Oh, if I had done it some other way!" Christ will make no record of our bungling way, if we did the best we could. He will make record of our intention and the earnestness of our attempt. We cannot get the attention of our class, or we break down in the exhortation, or our sermon falls dead, and we go home disgusted, and sorry we tried to speak, and feel Christ is afar off. Why, he is nearer than if we had succeeded, for he knows that we need sympathy, and is touched with our infirmity. It is comforting to know that it is not the learned and the great and the eloquent that Christ seems to stand closest by. A big gun may make a stunning noise, but it may burst before it accomplishes anything, while many an humble rifle may decide the contest. Christ made salve out of spittle to cure a blind man, and the humblest instrumentality may, under God, cure the blindness of the soul. Blessed be God for the comfort of his Gospel.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. O. M. Landis, Ellis, Kan. Can people be considered Christians who know they have driven a soul from God and make no effort to regain that soul or try to win it back to Christ or the Church?

We cannot conceive of such a course as you describe being followed by genuine Christians. See I. John 2: 9, 10, 11; Prov. 28: 10; Gal. 6: 1-5; James 5: 16, 19, 20.

G. W. Goodzman, Beaver, Iowa. Was Judas baptized and were the other disciples baptized before Christ instituted the Lord's Supper?

All who were John the Baptist's disciples before becoming Christ's disciples, like Andrew and his unnamed companion, would surely have been baptized by John the Baptist, but the fact is not recorded, save incidentally, as in John 3: 36.

"Christian," Ansonia, Conn. I am prompted by your answers to other subscribers on the subject of divorce to ask your opinion of the right course under the following circumstances: In the case of a wife forsaking her husband (who is a Christian), and obtaining a divorce from him by perjured testimony, after the husband has honestly tried to be reconciled—in such a case is the husband bound under Scriptural obligations to remain unmarried, the divorce being absolute?

In our opinion, he is not so bound, by any Scriptural obligations. The nearest approach to direction in such a condition as that you describe is in I. Cor. 7: 15, and the Apostle says the wronged partner "is not in bondage in such cases," by which he probably meant that all obligation had ceased.

E. Martin, Chambersburg, Pa. Are there different grades in heaven? I have asked this question of a Christian teacher and he said there were as there are here and that the poor would be the lower grade there as they are here. Is that so?

The few indications we have in the Bible to guide us as to the conditions of life after death imply that there will be degrees of glory. In Revelation you will find different orders mentioned. There are similar intimations in I. Cor. 15: 41 and in I. Cor. 3: 14, 15 and Luke 19: 16-19. Poverty certainly will not be the basis of classification. The idea is emphatically negatived (James 2: 1-5), and in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16: 19-25). Those who will be most honored will be those who have most faithfully followed and served Christ in their respective situations in life.

E. V. Shook, Lima, O. Are you correct in stating as you did in a recent editorial that the Campbellite Church is a branch of the Baptists, when as you are aware, Alexander Campbell was a Presbyterian?

The editorial did not attempt to classify the churches formally and accurately. Its object was to show that even churches near akin in their chief doctrines and mode of church government were separated by minor differences. Thus, the Campbellite Church being like the Baptists in insisting on immersion as the only valid mode of baptism was not united with them, as we should have expected, but is separate on other grounds. As they were formerly connected with the Baptists, but were excluded in 1827, it was not inappropriate to speak of the church as a branch of the Baptists.

Reader, Johnstown, Pa. Is it right for a woman to take the place of a man and superintend a church as a minister, having regard to Paul's prohibition (1. Cor. 14: 34), and to the fact that Christ appointed men to preach his Gospel?

The condition of women in that land in the time of Christ and his apostles would account for his appointing only men to preach. Women were treated as inferior beings, and it would have been considered immodest and scandalous for them to speak in public. There was still more cogent reason for Paul's prohibition, in the condition of society of Corinth. Whether the prohibition applies to the church of this day is a disputed question. To us, it does not seem a question of right or wrong, as you suggest, but of expediency and good taste. Intrinsically there can be nothing wrong in a woman being pastor of a church if she is spiritually and intellectually qualified.

Emma Pierson, Harton, Ia. At what time of the year was Christ born? A preacher told us last Sabbath that it was very cold in Palestine at this time of the year, and there was not a sheep to be found on the plains.

The month and day of the Saviour's birth cannot be determined, save approximately, the data being insufficient. The winter observance of Christmas is not of divine appointment, nor even of New Testament origin. For the first three centuries there was no special celebration of the nativity, and the Christmas festival, as we now know it, is of comparatively recent origin, having been adopted as a substitute for the heathen Saturnalia, which was celebrated in the winter, thus turning a pagan festival to Christian use. As to the actual season at which Christ was born, commentators are divided. It is not at all uncommon, however, to find shepherds armed with cudgels, out in the fields in winter, watching the sheepfolds and guarding them against depredations by wild beasts.

Subscriber, Shelter Island, N. Y. Did Jesus really increase in wisdom as stated in Luke 2: 52?

The statement is explicit and there is no reason for doubting it. Jesus was subject to human conditions and limitations so far as the divine nature could be subjected. We read of his being weary, of his being hungry and thirsty and we are assured that he was tempted in all points like as we are, which all show that in his physical nature he was human. Doubtless he would be educated like other boys, and probably his consciousness of divinity would be gradual, not complete until the forty days in the desert. His questioning the doctors in the Temple (Luke 2: 46) would be not catechizing them but to obtain information?

P. T. Glass, Kerrville, Tex. We learn from Gibbon, the historian, that the Roman Empire was overrun and destroyed by Goths, Huns and Vandals. Were they of Caucasian origin? It seems that they came originally from High Asia, and settled between the Caspian and Black Seas, and made their descent upon Rome from that country. Were the Aryans of Caucasian stock? What gave character to the Caucasian race?

The Vandals and Goths were of Aryan stock, while the Huns were probably of Finnish or Turanian extraction. The Aryan family, which extends from India to Europe, embraces many races and a variety of languages. Most of these races are included in the Caucasian branch of the human race, which embraced all the inhabitants of Europe (except the Finns), Persians, Assyrians, Arabians, Jews, Egyptians, Abyssinians, Moors, and the people of Asia Minor and the Caucasus. The distinguishing characteristics of the Caucasian are the enterprising, artistic, inventive, courageous, liberty-loving temperament, which finds its highest modern illustration in the European peoples.

A. H. Halona, Ia. 1. Can one be converted away from church and prayers, by praying and asking God to forgive? 2. Is it possible to live a Christian life without belonging to the Church? 3. By so living and yet not baptized, can one be saved? 4. Will God hear and answer the prayers of one who is striving to live right, yet not a member of the Church, and not baptized, as quickly as he will one who is a church member and baptized? 5. Please explain John 20: 23?

1. One can be converted away from church if he sincerely repents of sin and exercises faith in Christ. Many have been so converted. 2. That, too, is possible under certain circumstances, as in sickness, or when the person is living far away from a church. But a man who holds aloof from church-membership wilfully, deprives himself of one of the best aids to spiritual growth and fails to obey Christ's command to confess him before men. 3. As Christ enjoined baptism, the believer will earnestly desire to obey him in that particular. If he has the opportunity and fails to avail himself of it, we should doubt whether his conversion is genuine and therefore whether he will be saved, seeing that he wilfully disobeys his Lord. 4. God may answer his prayers, for his love and patience are infinite; but a man who is living in disobedience, has no ground for expecting an answer. 5. The Apostles were authorized to assure any man who complied with the conditions of the Gospel, that his sins were forgiven.

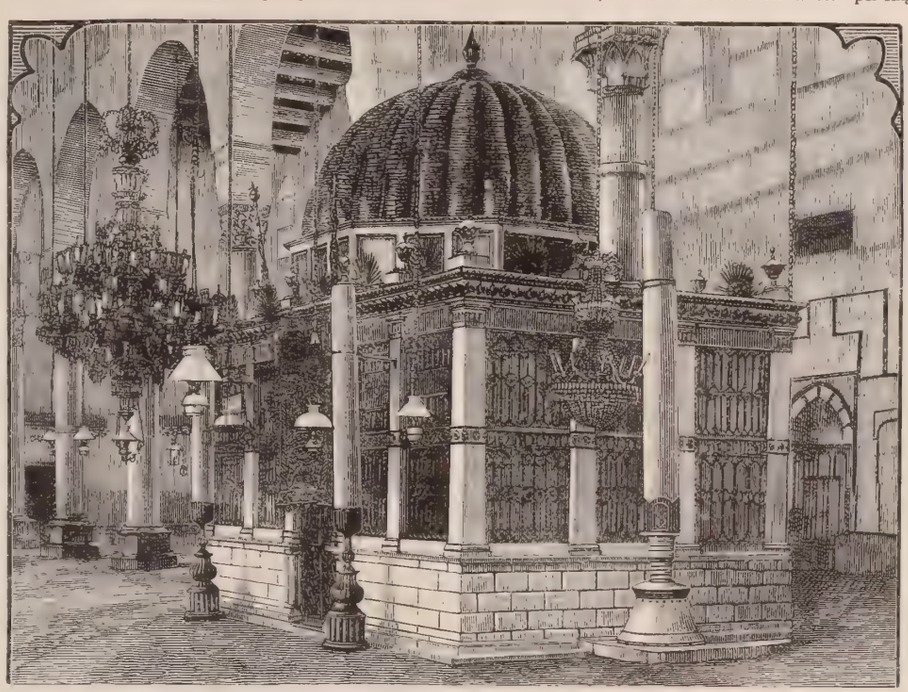
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

ISLAM'S GREAT TEMPLE BURNT.

FIRE has destroyed the famous mosque of Damascus, one of the most interesting relics of antiquity in the world. Some repairs were being made to the roof of it and the workmen were busy with their tools and furnaces. In the noon hour they lay around smoking and one of them accidentally started a fire with the ashes of his pipe. The flames spread rapidly, the means at hand for extinguishing it were inadequate, and in a very short time the mosque, a hundred shops and fifteen private houses were smouldering ruins. The building was a very ancient one. It is generally believed to have been the House of Rimmon where Naaman worshipped with the king of Syria (II. Kings 5: 18.) It was regarded as an ancient edifice in the fourth century, when the Emperor Arcadius transformed it from a heathen temple into a Christian church, ransacking the world for beautiful columns and sculptures with which to beautify it. When the Mohammedans captured Damascus, the church become a Mohammedan mosque and the Khalif brought 1,200 artists from Europe to aid in embellishing it. The lower walls were covered with rare marbles and rich mosaics and the ceilings inlaid with pure gold. Six hnndred gold lamps gave light to the interior and shed their lustre on a profusion of gold and gems of marvellous splendor. By a remarkable oversight, an inscription in Greek characters over the principal arch was left untouched and, until the destruction of the building a few weeks ago, it remained there. It read, "Thy kingdom, O, Christ, is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations"—a strange sight in a Mohammedan Mosque! Beneath the mosque, in a cave, was a richly jewelled casket, said to have held the head of John the Baptist. The Mohammedans had a tradition that his head would one day be miraculously joined with the body and restored to life, when he, with Christ and Mohammed, would sit on the great minaret of the mosque to judge the world. That tradition they will now have to abandon, for the mosque is completely destroyed. What conclusion they draw from the calamity we do not know, but it would be well if it were the lesson of the inscription on the arch of the burned mosque, that while the most stable and substantial things on earth pass away, the kingdom of Christ is eternal, and, as he told the Pharisees, "that kingdom is within you." (Luke 17: 21.)



SHRINE OF JOHN THE BAPTIST IN THE GRAND MOSQUE, DAMASCUS, LATELY DESTROYED BY FIRE.

An Unconscious Husband.

An extraordinary suit for divorce has been commenced in the Superior Court of New York. A wealthy lumberman from Portland, Oreg., is the plaintiff. A few weeks ago one of his friends returned from a visit to New York, and in conversation with him expressed sympathy in his matrimonial trouble. The lumberman declared that he did not need sympathy as he was not married. His friend, however, assured him that he had seen in New York a woman who claimed to be his wife, and having doubts as to her credibility, he had investigated the matter and had seen the certificate of marriage, which took place a year ago. The lumberman considered for a few minutes and then remembered that he had visited the city in December 1892 and spent a week in dissipation. He immediately set out for New York and instructed a legal firm to make inquiries. They soon discoved that he had been legally married, although he did not know the name of his wife, nor had held any communication with her since their marriage. As he could not remember anything of the circumstances, he concludes that he must have been intoxicated when the ceremony was performed. He, therefore, instructed his lawyers to commence suit for divorce. He was informed that unless he did so, the law would take no account of the absence of matrimonial relations, but would recognize the validity of the ceremony and give the woman all her rights as his wife. Some people seem to imagine that the same principle holds in religion and that although they are not living as Christians, they are saved because of their baptism or confirmation, or a public declaration made during the excitement of a revival meeting The Apostle Paul warned all such that no ceremonies were of any avail, without the faith that works by love. (Gal. 5: 6).

A Summons from the Czar.

A young farmer in Oregon was disagreeably reminded of his nationality last week. He came to this country from Russia six years ago and obtained employment on a farm in Kansas. He was then sixteen years old. On attaining his majority, he took out naturalization papers and removed to Oregon where he secured a farm. He has worked hard and has good prospects of success. Last week, an official document reached him from the Russian Consulate at San Francisco. It reminded him that he had to put in an appearance this year in his native province of Saratow to do service in the army. It also warned him that as the year was near its end he would do well to hasten his departure in order to avoid the consequences of violating the military laws of the Empire. The young man knew the rigor of those laws and was struck with consternation at the threat contained in the notice. He was advised to submit his case to the District Attorney. That official informed him that he need not return to Russia unless he wished to do so and that although the Czar's goverment had given surprising proof of its vigilance and persistence in keeping track of his movements for six years, it could do him no mischief. The laws of the United States were sufficient to protect their adopted citizens and the Czar could not enforce his claim on his services. Christ gives the same assurance to timid believers who fear that Satan will regain control over them and have them for his own. (John 10: 28.)

Worthless Apparatus.

A startling disclosure was made a few days ago by the captain of a wrecked vessel. In a letter of grateful acknowledgment to the life-saving crews and all who had aided in rescuing him and his crew from drowning, Captain W. M. Randall makes a statement which ought to lead to a thorough investigation. Captain Randall's vessel was wrecked on November 25th off the coast of Long Island. The upper spars were above the water and the captain and his wife and crew climbed into the rigging. They could be plainly seen from the shore, but it was impossible for any boat to reach them. They remained there in the bitter cold and drenched with the waves for twenty-six hours, until a wrecking steamer arrived and took them off. While they were in the rigging the life-saving crews fired the life-line projectiles to them repeatedly, but without avail. The captain tells the reason of the failure. The life-lines parted from the projectiles. Seven times the bolt passed over the ship, and in any one case if the rope had held, the crew could have made it fast and come ashore, but in each instance it parted from the projectile before reaching the ship. The captain says, that he could see the men of the life-saving station working nobly, but all their efforts were thwarted by the defective condition of the apparatus supplied to them by the Government. This trouble is never experienced by Christian workers who go out to save souls. They may say with confidence that they are "not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ for it is the power of God unto salvation." (Rom. 1:16.)

A Pitiless Landlord.

A sad sight was witnessed on East Broadway, New York, during the storm of December 13. A man whose face bore traces of recent sickness, stood out in the snow on the sidewalk, with two children and a few dilapidated articles of fnrniture. He had a sad story to tell. He had been sick and had lost his situation. His rent was a month in arrear, and that morning the landlord had told him that before noon he must quit the single room that he and his family occupied. His wife was ill in bed, and the man pleaded for a few days in which to get the money for the rent together. His plea was refused, and he then begged for a few hours, but was told that he must be out by noon. Everything of value that he possessed, even to the blankets from the sick woman's bed, had already been sold to pay for medicine for himself and his wife, but he took the one table and chair they had, and set out to get as much as he could for them. No one would buy so dilapidated a chair, so the man brought it back, with thirty-six cents, for which he had sold the table. He offered the money and everything in the room to the landlord if he would allow them to stay until his wife was able to move, but the offer was refused. The woman rose and dressed, and the landlord's men took the bed apart and carried it and the other things to the sidewalk. The sick woman fainted as she went down the stairs, and a woman, who occupied a room in the house, took pity on her and sheltered her and her infant, which was only a few days old. The man went down to the sidewalk with the other two children and stood there desolate amid his wretched belongings. It was a bitterly cold day, and the passers-by, seeing his condition, were moved to pity, which finally took shape in a subscription for his benefit. Before night it reached a sum sufficient to enable him to rent a shelter for his family. The landlord was acting strictly within his legal rights, but he must have forgotten that the divine law, to which he is also amenable, was broken by his harsh conduct. In this time of prevalent distress it is well for everyone to remember that mercy and kindness and relief of the poor are not optional, but are duties enjoined of God, which cannot be evaded without provoking his anger. (Prov. 21: 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A home for working girls where they will be prepared for missionary work has been opened at 360 West 50th st., New York. It is called Hepsibar House and is under the charge of a board of which Miss Margaret Thorne is president.

Gipsy Smith has been holding large meetings in Glasgow in Whitevale Free Church. All through the week the building was quite full. An average of nearly thirty persons nightly remained to the inquiry meeting, a large proportion of whom made profession of faith.

Evangelist Arthur Crane is holding union services under the auspices of the International Evangelistic Association in the West Twenty-fifth Street Baptist Church, New York. On December 18 an all-day meeting was held.

Evangelist Charles Minor, the converted English comedian, has been holding meetings at the Y. M. C. A., of Trenton, N. J., and in the State prison in that city. He is now conducting meetings at St. Luke's M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. His address is 203 Wilson street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Professor D. B. Towner, the famous Gospel singer, associated with Mr. Moody and other Evangelists, has accepted the office of Musical Director of the Bible Institute of Chicago, of which Dr. Torrey is principal. There are upwards of three hundred students in the Institute.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions reports the receipts for November $57,570 as against $49,458 for the preceding year, and for seven months $239,089 against $206,424.

The Rev. Dr. J. J. Moore, senior Bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church and the oldest bishop of any denomination in America, died at Greensboro, N C., December 9th, at the age of ninety. He had held the office of bishop nearly twenty-six years, his labors covering every State in the Union.

The "New York Heraid" publishes a dispatch from Shamokin, Pa., which states that a man named Simpkins of that town, who was remarkable for his profanity, was suddenly stricken dumb sometime ago, after uttering an awful imprecation. On December 13 he attended a revival service at the Methodist Church and went to the altar, where, to the surprise of all, his tongue was loosed and he spoke plainly.

The Treasurer of the American Board reports the receipts for the month of November as $52,477.71, and for the three months of the financial year $134,431.67. This is a gain for the last month over the corresponding month of 1892 of over $16,000, and for the three months of about $22,500. The gain has been chiefly in donations, amounting to $21,323. The Broadway Tabernacle, New York, alone, gave five thousand dollars. The increased income is mainly due to the change of the Board's policy as to the endorsement of Mr. Noyes in Japan.

The priest of a considerable town in France, Nanteuil, having attended meetings on the McAll Mission Boat, the Bon Messenger, was so much struck by the character of the singing as a means of awaking interest in the preacher's message, that he afterward called upon Captain and Mrs. Prin (who manage the boat and conduct the meetings), with the request for a copy of the hymn book that he might use it in his own church.

Three services are to be held every day in Brooklyn during the week of prayer. The first will be at noon at Association Hall; the second at three o'clock at Lafayette Presbyterian Church, and the third at eight o'clock in several churches as may be found necessary. The services are under the charge of a committee of which Dr. Gregg is chairman.

Major George A. Hilton, commences a series of services at Pittsburg, Pa., on Dec. 31. His meetings at West Newton, Pa., were densely crowded and overflow meetings had to be held. Several churches united in the work and services were held in the various church buildings every day and at night in the large hall. On December 8 for the first time on a week day in the history of the town, all business places closed and the employees went to church. All the churches have received accessions.

Rev. B. Fay Mills suggests that homeless and destitute men might be allowed to sleep in the churches during the cold nights of the winter. During his stay in Chicago recently, he heard that one night six hundred men slept on the stone floors of the corridors of the City Hall. He mentioned the fact in a sermon, and a collection was taken up to feed such men, and that night the church doors were opened to the men and they each received a sandwich, the cost being defrayed by the collection taken up in the church service.

The Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist churches of Rondout, N. Y., have been engaged in evangelistic work under the leadership of D. W. Munhall for two weeks. On December 10th, in the afternoon, the Opera House was crowded with young men. Fully three hundred of them arose for prayers, and one hundred and thirty-three professed conversion. At the same hour a meeting for women only was conducted by Mr. Birch, Mr. Munhall's associate, which filled the Presbyterian church. At night two churches were necessary to accommodate the crowds.

OWNING GOD AND OWNED BY HIM.

Preached last Sunday morning, Dec. 24, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

Text: Malachi 3: 16-18. "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another: and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name," etc.

THERE has been much discussion as to whether the name Malachi is an actual name of a prophet, or simply the name of an office or mission. Some make the name identical with "my messenger," or "my angel;" but the correspondence between the name and Malachi's errand as the messenger of Jehovah, does not prove the name to be fictitious. It has been pointed out that this correspondence between names and calling is a frequent characteristic of Hebrew names. True, nothing is said of the parentage or birthplace of the prophet; but Dr. Hackett has shown that this omission is not peculiar to Malachi, for of the sixteen prophets, whose writings are preserved in the canon, the fathers of only eight are named. It is, therefore, far more natural for us to understand the name as that of a man rather than of an office.

Those who are competent to speak on the subject, say that the style of the prophet's language is that of the reasoner rather than that of the poet. Instead of the fiery poetical eloquence of Isaiah, Malachi gives us the calm and almost artificial discourse of the experienced orator. His language is clear and finished, and he introduces new lines of thought with much skill. He does not deal in the ancient dramatic manner of some prophets, but in a dialogue between God and the people. Their half-mocking questions he answers with scorn. He writes as one aware that he is the last of the sacred bards. In connection with the text we have fine examples of the prophet's style; we have a short, pertinent statement or question; then the unbelieving answer of the people; and then, finally, his triumphant refutation. Let us notice, in the 16th verse

The Characteristics of the Time.

The word "then" suggests there were special reasons in the circumstances of the time which gave peculiar significance to the conduct of the godly. The verses which precede describe these characteristics. It was a time when evil abounded, and when evil doers were bold and defiant. Perhaps it is always so. There will ever be husks with the corn, tares with the wheat and false professors of the faith with the true.

These verses show us that God was angry with the sinners in Zion: these men endeavored to ridicule and falsify religion; they misrepresented God; they despised his commands. God carefully observes them and brings a severe indictment against their conduct. He charges them with having spoken stout words against him, words born of a defiant and ungodly spirit. But their moral perceptions were so blunted that they had no sense of their guilt; in assumed or real amazement they ask, "What have we spoken so much against thee?" They made light of their sin. They said it is in vain to serve God; and they asked, "what profit is it that we have kept his ordinances?" This is a spirit of unbelief and infidelity which manifests itself in varying forms in every age.

Now at that time, says Malachi,—a time when men were bold and bad, when God was despised and defied, when religion was ridiculed, and the religious mocked—a time when even the priests were guilty of marrying foreign wives; even at this time there were those who cleaved unto God with earnestness, affection and devotion. To the godly the spirit and conduct of these profligates and rebels were hateful.

We notice now the characteristics of God's people as here described. "They feared the Lord." This is a fundamental characteristic of true Christians: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; it is the root of true religion. Although it was a great time of wickedness, there were those who reverenced the majesty of God, and submitted to his authority. The conduct of these is brought out in striking contrast with that of those referred to in the previous verses. While one class was rushing into all manner of evil, the other class was earnestly worshipping God. God has never left himself without a witness; in every age some noble souls have been found faithful to truth and to God. In dens and caves, at the stake, amid fagot and flame, always God has his witnesses who are willing to be faithful even unto death.

This fear, at least in the beginning of the Christian life, does not exclude fear in the lower uses of the word. God has planted fear in the soul as truly as hope or love; not to fear when there is good cause, is as foolish as to fear when there is no cause. God appeals to this element; it is in the case of some men the only part of the nature which will respond; and men must be taken where they are found.

The Heart has Many Doors:

over one is written fear, over another hope, over another love, Christ knocks at all; some persons open one, others another door and he enters. But the Christian comes up out of this religion of fear; he serves God finally not for fear of punishment or hope of reward. This fear when perfected is not that of the crouching slave but rather that of the glad son. This fear is a mighty power. It drives out all other fear; for the man who truly fears God, fears none beside.

"They spake often to one another." The rebels and infidels spoken of in the previous verses, encouraged one another in evil; but the saints were helping one another in good. By mutual exhortation they strengthened one another's hands in the Lord; they kept up the communion of saints. Their hearts were full, and out of the abundance of the heart their mouths spake; the fire burned within, and neither its light nor its heat could be long hidden. The apostles could not if they would conceal the fact that they had been with Jesus. Their holy speech betrayed them. Christ's love in the soul will reveal itself in the tone of the voice, in the glance of the eye, the grasp of the hand. A man who has learned the love of God learns to love those who love God. He knows that the best friends for him to have are those who are God's friends; and those whose names he prefers to write among his choicest companions, are those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of Life. Here is illustrated the great law of gravitation. The Apostles on a certain occasion having been arrested, upon being dismissed went to their own company. The expressive language of the record in Acts 4: 23 is: "And being let go, they went unto their own company." It must ever be so. The law of is as certain as that of physical gravitation; like seeks like. Bring one hundred young men from the country to the city and let them go on some corner. Some go at once to a saloon, some to a church. They are under this law. So at death some will be banished from God; some will go directly to God. God is not arbitrary in his eternal allotments.

It was so with these godly men in the text. If iniquity abounded, they must see to it that love and grace did much more abound. They must be strictly loyal, or openly and determinedly disloyal. Oh, men and women, who fear God, speak often to one another, in the home, in the office and store, and on the street; learn to speak always and everywhere the fitting word one to another for your own good and for God's glory. Let it be said of us, as of these, "Then they that feared the Lord, spake often to one another."

God noticed the acts and heard the words of his faithful witnesses; "the Lord hearkened and heard." He not only heard the words of their mouths, but he noticed the meditations of their hearts. Oh! you have thought at times that there was no eye to see you and no ear to hear, that the heavens were brass, and the earth iron. Take fresh courage! You are not alone in the fierce struggle. Think of thy Lord in that terrible conflict in the wilderness. Remember that he was tempted, and that he suffered being tempted, and remember that because of that experience he is now a faithful and merciful High Priest. God sees and hears in secret and he will reward openly. Often in our sorrows and tears we do not see him, and do not know him even when we do see him, neither did Mary at the tomb; neither did the disciples on the way to Emmaus. There is a solemn thought in this truth; God heard your horrible oath; your abominable lie; your impure joke—"all things are naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do."

The Book of Remembrance.

"A book of remembrance was written before him." God does not require to keep a journal; but, of course, this language is spoken after the manner of men. Ancient kings had books in which they recorded the names of those who had done great deeds; and at given times these books were opened and read to the king and the people. Rewards were given according to the records which were written in the book. As God has bottles for the tears, so he has books for the sighs of his mourners, the deeds of his workers, the alms of his givers, and the prayers of his suppliants. You never spoke a good word for or of God that is not written in the book of God.

"And that thought upon his name." God had found a home in their souls; they meditated on his word and his works. Upon all the revelations which he has made of himself in his works, his words and his providences, they meditated with joy. It is a sweet thought that when through timidity we cannot speak of God, God notes our thought. An invariable characteristic of true piety is the disposition to think about God; the mind of all God's children naturally turn to God. It is an evidence that a man is converted, that during intervals in business in the day-time, and in wakeful hours at night the mind naturally and lovingly dwells on God. This was the experience of the psalmist. A Christian has joy in such meditations; but the sinner has no such tendency; the thought of God is painful to him; he does not desire to have it suggested, and when suggested he turns away from it and avoids it as something painful. To these godly people of whom the text speaks, God's name was sacred. God's name is God himself in the fullness of his power, goodness, justice, truth and love. God's name in all the glory of its full manifestation to us, is Christ; Jesus said that "he that hath seen me has seen the Father."

Solitary Meditation.

What an inexhaustible subject of contemplation God is! Much as we have learned, there is much more to learn. High as we may have risen, there are loftier heights yet unattained. Eternity will be our school for this study, but even eternity will not exhaust the lesson. Meditation, earnest and inteligent thought of God, is one of the needs of our Christian life today. Ours is a bustling and active life; our religious work partakes of the intense activities of our age. The cry is, "Work, work, work." The young Christian is exhorted to "work for Jesus." This is right; but the well-balanced Christian life must have in it also the element of meditation. Christ must be in all our thoughts. The noblest life is not found in the busy scenes of the market-place. Solitariness has its dangers; it also has its advantages. In solitude the murderer lays his plans, and the suicide reaches his determination; but in solitude also the noblest projects for God and man are matured. When the soul is alone with God, hid with him in his pavilion, then its grandest powers are called into exercise; then it feels the throbs of God's heart and catches the inspiration of his infinite and immortal life. Every truly noble life will consist of its hemispheres of solitude and activity; it will have its communion with God when it receives its divine supplies, and its times of communication with men when it gives out what it has received. God gives us a further promise respecting his saints: "They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." Soon the Jewish church and nation, as such, were to be cut off; but there would be a remnant among the people who believed the Word of God, and waited for the consolation of Israel. This remnant would welcome the Messiah and be received into the Christian church. They should be a peculiar people to God; they should not perish with those who believed not. In the day when God's fierce anger was revealed against the nation and the city of the Jews, this remnant by heeding the words of Christ, was saved. But the words have a wider meaning; they apply to all the true people of God and the distinction which he would put between them and the world. The saints are they are God's treasure, his "segullah." God rejoices in his redeemed. They are a royal diadem in his hands. They are his chosen treasures; and beside them all else is dross. There is a day coming when God shall make up his jewels. Now they are scattered; now they are mingled with the rubbish of the world. But he shall send forth his angels to gather the elect from the four winds of heaven. Those who now own God as theirs, he will then own as his.

Thus shall it be seen that there is a distinction between those who serve God and those who serve him not. These rebels represented God as making no difference, they said it is vain to serve him; that God cares not; that he makes no distinction. Evil men say so to-day, and good men sometimes fall into the same example of unbelief. Trials come to all Christians; they even seem at times to have more than their share; we are often tempted still to call the proud happy, and the despisers prosperous. Wait a little, God says, and men shall see their error; the matter will yet be set right. Wrong shall yet be crucified, and right glorified. "Then shall he return and discern betwen the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." Ye shall return to your senses. Ye shall change your mind. Sin is blindness; men under its influence cannot see. Sin is madness; men cannot reason when sin controls them. Primarily this line of reasoning refers to the difference between believing Jews and those who persisted in their unbelief in the earliest day and also at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Those who believed Christ's word escaped when the saw Jerusalem compassed with armies, and those who believed not perished. But of these truths will be at the day of judgment. Some will be with the sheep on the right hand; and others with the goats on the left. The one class will be crying to the rocks and the mountains to fall upon them and to hide them from him who sits on the throne; the other class will be rejoicing in finding in the judge their dearest friend and Saviour.

In God's sight all men are either righteous or wicked. It is hard now always to distinguish them. The righteous often appear worse than they are; the wicked often better. God does not here and now smile on the good or frown on the bad; but at this bar the distinction will be easy enough. All disguises will then be removed, and every man will appear in his true character. Every man's work will be tried and what sort it is will appear. The difference between the two classes will then be marked, awful and eternal. The righteous will be received into the kingdom of glory, and the wicked cast out forever. Then it will be seen that the truly wise are those who took up their cross and followed Christ through evil as well as good report.

The abuses of the Mosaic system led to the idea that prosperity or adversity in this life was the proof of God's favor or disfavor. The moral of the book of Job, that sublime poem of antiquity, is a noble protest against the abuse of this principle. The argument of the magnificent colloquies of Job and his comforters contradicts these narrow conclusions. Not always are rewards given to the good here, nor punishment to the evil. But the day is coming when every wrong will be righted; when every groan will be music and every tear a jewel. Hasten the day, O Christ, gather thine elect from the four winds of heaven; put the wheat into thy barn, even though the chaff must be burned with unquenchable fire!

O, King Jesus, let us be diamonds in the crown of thy glory! May we know that they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever! May we blessedly experience the promise, "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels!"

JERSEY CITY: My beautiful Teachers' Bible received. Am perfectly delighted with it. I can hardly see how you can give such a marvellous premium as this. Many thanks to you and the good Doctor for offering this beautiful Bible at such reasonable terms that every one can receive one. MILTON W. SHIVE.

NEW ORLEANS: Your premiums, Bible and From Manger to Throne, received to-day, and I am delighted with them. If this new Bible gives as much pleasure and profit as the one I bought some years ago, it will be a double bargain for me. A. W. CREEVY.

SOUTH CHICAGO, ILL.: From Manger to Throne came to hand this morning in excellent shape. I am not surprised at your munificence as I have done business with you before; but friends to whom I have shown the book are astonished at your generous business methods. HARRY GREY.

VALLEY VIEW, PA.: I prize THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose sentiments are as precious as jewels, whose words are as rare as diamonds and whose language is as sparkling as gems. It is the means of redeeming many souls. It begets biblical knowledge in the mind. I cannot do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which I love as my true friend. RILEY O. SCHEIB.

BALTIMORE, MD.: From Manger to Throne, reading and illustrative matter far exceeds my expectation, and the size of the print is good so that even mother finds no trouble in reading. We would not, upon any account, be without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in our home. Everybody looks for it, and every Sunday night my father, who does not attend church on account of his hearing, is eager to peruse its contents. GEORGE H. WHITEHOUSE.

AUBURN, NEB.: From Manger to Throne came the long distance from New York to Nebraska in good order, not a mar nor rub and not one cent to pay for expressage. I know not where your profit is in sending such a premium with your paper, but hope the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be doubled this year, and that you will have your reward when the labors of this life are done. H. D. SNYDER.

COHOES, N. Y.: That beautiful book From Manger to Throne, came Monday the 11th. "Pleased," would not express it; we are perfectly delighted, and will take great pleasure in showing it to everybody we know. We are three sisters—two are Sunday School teachers and hope to get much help from both book and paper. The next thing we want is one of those nice Teachers' Bibles. MARGARET MCGAFFIN.

OSWEGO, N. Y.: Your beautiful book From Manger to Throne is all it is represented to be; and it is a generous present to your subscribers; as the amount above the price of the paper cannot more than pay the expense of packing and express charges. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the very best paper I know of. I like it so well that it has been a great self-denial to send it away to others, as I have nearly always done, wishing to share the good things with my friends. MARY RAMIE.

NEW YORK: Through the kindness of a brother in the ministry I have received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the beautiful premium From Manger to Throne. This I have very carefully examined and compared it with other books on the same subject. Its modern testimony, and the recent developments in the Holy Land, will, I am sure, quicken the thoughts of many, on the life of our Saviour, and make them the more precious. It is an accession to my library which I could not well do without. REV. J. S. GORTON.

DALLAS, TEX.: I supposed, when, a year ago, I received the Oxford Bible, that you only gave such costly premiums to increase your subscription list; since I am sure that those who receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD once will continue to do so, premium or no premium. But here you are again adding surprise to surprise. Now, I have decided not to be astonished at the HERALD any more. It has decided to be unique in its dealings with its readers, and it will do so regardless of cost. For of course the $2. I sent will not really pay for the HERALD for a year and this delightful volume, From Manger to Throne, to make no mention of the prepaid express charges upon a large and handsomely bound volume coming all the way from New York to Texas. I am more than pleased. MRS. ANNIE D. BRADLEY.

Associate Editress, Christian Courier.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.: From Manger to Throne came and I am delighted with it. You did not say one word too much in its praise. I have the Olive Wood and it has been much admired. MRS. J. L. FLOWERS.

DUBUQUE, IA.: From Manger to Throne is a very fine premium book and one that will adorn any centre-table in the land. The type, paper and photos are all excellent. Wishing you the compliments of the season. T. S. ADDINSELL.

EDENWOOD PARK, FORDHAM, N. Y.: I cannot adequately express my thanks to you for the premium From Manger to Throne. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was a great help to me in the past year. Without your paper I would be very lonesome; it is a friend who every week encourages and brightens every home its reaches. ELMER W. FLEAGLE.

MASSAPEQUA, ME.: From Manger to Throne reached me in due time. I scarcely can frame words to express my delight in possessing so great a treasure as this grand volume. Upon opening it, and looking over its contents, I exclaim, "Thank God that it is through his goodness that I am the happy owner of so grand a work!" My prayer is that it may be the means in the world of drawing multitudes to seek that holy city, Mount Zion, whose maker and builder is God. MRS. R. C. VOORIS.

POPLAR GROVE, ILL.: With From Manger to Throne I am pleased more than I can tell. It doesn't only enrich our library, but the mind is enriched also. Furthermore I think THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is worth two dollars, and I consider the book as a gift. F. S. SPENCER.

NEW MARKET, KY.: I have deferred giving you my opinion concerning the merits of either From Manger to Throne or THE CHRISTIAN HERALD until I had given them a careful perusal, as I am too puritanical to pay a compliment composed of empty words. From Manger to Throne I have read with deep interest, and I can assure you that I do appreciate the work very highly; you will please accept thanks for the beautiful gift. We found a most welcome surprise in your book. We are also delighted with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yesterday when the December number came we almost forgot our manners in our anxiety to be the first to enjoy its contents. MRS. MAGGIE E. MILTON.

NEW YORK: I positively cannot be profuse enough to describe my ecstacy and gratification, not to say wonderment, at your magnificent Premium given me in renewing my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The exquisite International Teachers' Emerald Bible more than meets my most sanguine expectations. I have now in contemplation securing your From Manger to Throne. How do you do it for the price? Have just received a pleasant epistle from our friend, Marion Harland, (Mrs. M. V. Terhune, now travelling in the interest of your paper), from abroad en-route to the Holy Land. It is dated at Paris, November 15th, and says: "Please accept my grateful acknowledgments for your graceful note and for the card bearing your 'Bon Voyage,' and the four-leaved clover. I accept both as favorable auguries." She has the best wishes for a pleasant sojourn on the continent and a safe and early passage home, from all the HERALD's readers. WILTON N. ANDERSON.

ESMONT, VA.: More than pleased with the marvellous premium, the noble work of Dr. Talmage. I have for years derived benefi and spiritual wealth from your glorious CHRISTIAN HERALD of The Kingdom of Christ.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year,
Is worth the price alone:—
But here's a PREMIUM!—Good and dear:—

THE COMING REGENERATION.

The Restoration of Israel the Beginning of Universal Blessedness.

BY REV. W. WILLIAMS.

THE casting away of Israel, mentioned by the Apostle in Rom. 11: 15, and its effect upon the Gentile world, are matters of history and experience; it remains for us to inquire what the receiving of them shall be, and the effect upon the same peoples, both which are yet only subjects of prophecy and objects of hope.

It is manifest that the "receiving" of Israel must be the restoring of them to all that which they lost at their "casting away;" for the two words are evidently contrasted with one another; so that whatever is implied as having been done by the one, just so much must be implied as being to be undone by the other. Having therefore seen what was lost at the casting away, we shall have no difficulty in understanding at once what will be restored at the receiving.

They lost their position as God's visible people; they lost the privilege of having the Lord known as their God. And this, then, will be restored to them again. It will be accompanied with true conversion of heart: they will be invested with the reality of those privileges which, at any former time, Israel, as a whole, have only outwardly enjoyed. For it is written in (Jer. 31: 33), "After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts: and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." At that time, therefore, the nation will be reinstated in the full enjoyment of their own land; for their obedience being secured, the inheritance will be no longer withheld. (It is not intended to be asserted, that the Jews will not occupy their own land before their conversion to Jesus; it may, or may not, be so; that is not the question before us. But there can be no doubt, that that restoration which is the subject of promise, and contains in it so many blessings, is inseparably connected with their obedience, and cannot take place apart from it.)

What, then, shall be the effect of this upon the Gentile world?" Even "life from the dead." Let us observe here, by the way, how wonderful in wisdom, love, and grace, is the whole plan of Divine procedure in this matter. The Lord first casts away Israel and takes up the Gentiles, in order that he may thereby bring Israel to repentance? but when this is accomplished, and Israel is received again, it will not be to the casting away back of the Gentiles to what they were before, but to the increase of their good; for, as St. Paul reasons before, "If the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness." Thus the Jew and the Gentile are made to be the cause of blessing to one another: the reconciling of the Gentiles issues in the receiving of Israel, and the receiving of Israel issues in life from the dead to the Gentiles.

But to return; what, then, is the nature of this blessing, this "life of the dead," of which the apostle speaks? It is not the resurrection of the body which is here intended. This "life from the dead," can only refer to that quickening of the soul from the death of trespasses and sins whereby men become new creatures, and live unto God. The condition of the Gentiles since their reconciling has been altogether like unto the condition of Israel before their casting away. But as when Israel is received again it will be with the true circumcision, which "is that of the heart, in the spirit, but not in the letter." (Rom. 2: 20); so will it be followed by the true baptism of the Gentile word, baptism not by water only, but of the Spirit, whereby men shall be fitted to form a constituent part of the kingdom of Christ and of God.. (John 3: 5.)

At that day, therefore, the majority among the Gentiles shall be the true servants of Christ. They are now the few who are in spirit and in truth that which they are in profession—the people of God. The multitude answer to the description of the Church at Sardis, "Thou hast a name that thou livest and art dead." But then they will be the few to whom such language can be applied, while the many will "yield themselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and their members as instruments of righteousnes unto God." (Rom. 6: 13.)

In that day, therefore, will be fulfilled the promise for which the church has so long waited in anxious expectation: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

BEGINNINGS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Jan. 7, 1894. John 1: 1-17.

BEGINNING a new year is the popular occasion for all kinds of personal reform, and the making of good resolutions, and the setting out on new lines. The old page blurred and blotted and showing marks of attempted erasures, is turned,and the clean page is open for a new record. The old page was new once and there is a sad consciousness in looking over it, of the bright hopes and firm resolves with which it was begun. Some, there are, who are so oppressed by the memory, and by the memories of the beginnings of many such years, with their disappointing sequence, that they are disposed to make no further effort, and determine to make no vow,lest as in the other years, they should vow and not pay. The condition of all such is deplorable, for it has in it the omen of further decadence. It implies a relaxation of effort and an abandonment of high ideals. It implies, too, a lack of manliness and true courage. Although the new year is merely an imaginary line, no more sacred than any other time, it constitutes. by custom, a passage into a new era, and so forms an appropriate time for review and a look ahead. To everyone the past is more or less unsatisfactory. He is a weak and craven creature who is not impelled to resolve that the future shall be better than the past. The only way in which it can be made better is through a searching scrutiny of the past for the causes of failure. Human nature is weak and its weakness must be realized. The brute in man is continually struggling for supremacy. Its demands are loud, fierce, and persistent. The spirit yields its right to rule and permits the usurper to direct the life in which it should be merely the instrument and servant. This discovery any man may make for himself. The analysis of every failure will prove it to him. That fact ascertained, the remedy must be sought. "If any man live after the flesh he shall die." We know by experience that it is so. The man dies and the brute lives on. The remedy is revealed, and it thrills with hope and new courage. God is always on the side of the spirit in man.So much is he the ally of the spirit, in the struggle with the brute, that he places the resources of omnipotence at the command of the spirit. They who live after the spirit can claim divine help in unlimited degree. This is what Christ meant when he said that all things were possible to him that believeth. The conviction that the promise of God in this matter will be fulfilled, once possessing the mind of any man is the beginning of new hope, new effort and a new life. The use of the conviction may be tentative at first, but it becomes stronger by every victory and it leads to heights undreamed of. What shall he do to be saved from the brute that is dragging him down? He must believe. With belief in his heart the road to victory lies open before him. He begins a life which reaches on into eternity and ever on to infinity. The beginning of that life dwarfs into insignificance all other beginnings.

THE Y. W. C. A. OF TOLEDO, O.

An excellent work is being done in Toledo, Ohio, by the Young Women's Christian Association. Although the birthday it is celebrating this week is only its third,it has a membership of over six hundred and its organization is thorough in all its branches. The pictures on this page of the two rooms will show the homelike arrangements which are made for the comfort of the members. They are two of the rooms in the large three story and basement brick house on Madison Street, in which the Association does its work. This is the third home it has had. At its first organization it was supposed that one room would be sufficient; but the room speedily proved inadequate for the numbers who came to enjoy the advantages offered. Two rooms in another building were secured, and these were thought to be ample, but the membership quadrupled in a year and more space had to be secured. The Association then moved into its present quarters which seemed too large for it a year ago, but are now already crowded. One of its rooms is devoted to a restaurant where meals are supplied at phenomenally low prices. Others are used as class-rooms, library, reading-room, auditorium and offices. The Association has no space for a gymnasium, but has effected an arrangement by which its members use a gymnasium in an adjacent street and receive physical instruction there. Three Bible-classes are held each week, with which the devotional meetings are combined. The educational classes cover studies in Stenography, Typewriting, French, German, Music, Millinery, Dressmaking, and several other branches. An extra fee to cover expenses of teaching is required for these,but the fee for a full membership in the Association is only one dollar a year.

A NOBLE JUNIOR SOCIETY.

Our friend Mr. John J. Barret of Louisville, Ky., sends us the following encouraging account of the work of a Junior Society of Christian Endeavor in a country village: "It is connected with the Presbyterian Church of Anchorage, Ky. Taking the suggestion from the accounts given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the good work done by Gospel cars, the Society last July bought a large wagon and a double set of harness costing $111.65. This has been paid excepting $28.65. This balance is yet not in sight but God will send it in some way. A pair of horses have been borrowed for Sunday afternoons and the Society numbering about forty has gone under the leadership of the Elders of the Church to out-of-the-way farm houses and held services. Few of the members are over fourteen, yet they have read the Bible, sung Gospel and other hymns and repeated the Lord's prayer. These with an address by the pastor or an Elder have constituted the services. We think the meetings have been blessed, for those we visited have given us heartfelt thanks; some have begun attendance at church, two have returned to our church, and a Society with a membership of fifteen at the beginning has been started in an adjoining village. Is this not a good record for children the majority of whom are inmates of an Orphan's Home? We ask your and your readers' prayers for our future work. May other country Societies try our plan."

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN GEORGIA.

Citizens of the State of Georgia have reason for congratulation on the possession of so energetic and devoted a band of ladies as the King's Daughters of that section. The report which the State Secretary, Miss Kate B. Anderson, sends to the "Silver Cross" shows how effective is the workthe Order is doing in both philanthropy and religion. One of the circles besides visiting the sick and suffering and relieving the poor,and doing a great deal of church work, contributed $25 to the poor fund of the church and sent a large box of clothing to the Thornwell Orphan Asylum. Committees visit the sick and destitute monthly, carrying flowers and delicacies, besides more substantial relief. They also contributed $50 to aid in discharging a church debt, also clothing and fuel to the poor in quantities. On their roll call there are twenty-three members—all zealous workers—relieving a large amount of suffering. They have an initiation service, which is very impressive. Another circle supports an aged Christian invalid and not long ago adopted a baby, practically orphaned, who is to be supported and educated by the circle. Another circle pays the rent of a number of needy persons who are poor and sick. Two day nurseries have been established and are supported by the King's Daughters. When a large number of workmen were thrown out of employment, the King's Daughters supported the needy until public subscriptions could be secured. Each circle has its appointed district and the circles whose sphere includes jails and other public institutions receive help from the other circles. Prayer meetings are regularly held in stores, factories and homes,and ingenious and very charming methods are adopted for reaching strangers and non-church-goers.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

For Mr. Moody's evangelistic meetings in Chicago the Christian Endeavor Societies contributed $1,834.74.

An Associational Union of B.Y.P.U. has been formed in the Clarion Association of Pennsylvania. Organization was perfected at a meeting held at New Bethlehem, Pa.

The Second Presbyterian Church of Nashville, Tenn., is without a pastor, but the Endeavorers have taken charge of the services, are having good, spiritual meetings, and are doing all they can to carry on the church work.

An effort is on foot in Poona, Bombay Presidency, India, to provide the Y.M.C.A. with a suitable building of its own in which to carry on its excellent work. Mr. Robert McCann, missionary secretary from England, is assisting the project.

The central branch of the Young Women's Christian Association in Sydney, Australia holds every Friday social meetings for special classes (as, for example, the employees of a particular house of business or hotel). These efforts have proved singularly useful.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Brighton Road Church, Dublin, Ireland, has now an active roll of thirty-four members and ten associates. Besides the Prayer meeting, Look-out, and Social Committees, there has lately been added a Music Committee, Hospital-visiting Department, a Library, and a Question Box.

California has denominational Endeavor secretaries, and one of these sends out to all secretaries of the denomination a list of questions calling for reports as to work done, gifts made, new methods tried, experiences that would benefit other societies and openings for new societies.

The Women's Christian Association of Philadelphia is furnishing its bed-rooms as fast as donations for the purpose are received. The furniture of a double bedded room costs $75 and for one with a single bed $50. It has 104 of the latter still unfurnished. Pledges have been received for all the former in the new building. The rooms will be occupied as soon as they are furnished

To avoid the difficulty which has arisen from the use of various forms of badges by members of the Y.M.C.A's, the international badge has been adopted by the English National Council as the only official badge for the United Kingdom. Improved designs are in process of execution with a view to its being more generally worn, particularly in view of the forthcoming International Conference to be held in London in June next.

The "Iowa Endeavorer" gives an interesting account of the formation of a Christian Endeavor Society in Franklin township, Green County, Ia., in a rural district where there is no church. It originated in the unsupported efforts of one young girl, who got together a society of eleven members, which has now increased to thirty-seven. Nine of their associate members have accepted Christ, and become active. They meet from house to house, having an average attendance of about forty.

IT PAYS.

IT pays to wear a smiling face
And laugh our troubles down,
For all our little trials wait
Our laughter or our frown.
Beneath the magic of a smile
Our doubts will fade away,
As melts the frost in early Spring
Beneath the sunny ray.

It pays to help a worthy cause,
By making it our own;
To give the current of our lives
A true and noble tone.
It pays to comfort heavy hearts
Oppressed with dull despair,
And leave in sorrow-darkened lives
One gleam of brightness there.

A Midwinter Exposition.

California's Fair a Marvel of Enterprise —How the Preparations go on.

HALF the population of the Pacific Slope and all of California are just now enthusiastic over the preparations for the Midwinter Exposition which is to be held in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco. The Midwinter Fair, while it will not be on the same gigantic scale of magnificence as the White Exposition of Chicago, will yet be something of which the Far West may well be proud. It will not only represent the farming, fruit-growing, mining, and other industries of the State of California, but will take a much wider range, and include those of all the Pacific States, not a few States East of the Rockies and even some foreign countries. In consequence of the unexpected and numerous applications from outside quarters, the Fair promises to be a success, especially in the number and variety of exhibits. Buildings have sprung up on all sides in Golden Gate Park, beautiful in design and attractive in exterior, the interiors of which will, when finished, afford a rich display. Almost all the counties in the State are working energetically to make the Exposition a success, and are forwarding extensive exhibits. One of the finest features will be the citrus fair, which will attract many thousands of visitors. South America, Alaska, Japan, China, the Orient generally and the isles of the Pacific will be fitly represented, the close commercial relations of California with those parts of the world affording superior facilities for such a purpose.

There is no more attractive city in America than San Francisco, whose suburban parks and romantic drives, owing to climatic advantages, are far more beautiful than those of the average Northern or Western city. Winter in California is June-like, and the transition from arctic gales and snow-drifts to a land of perennial fruits and flowers is a pleasant one for visitors.

Golden Gate Park, where the Fair is located, is a beautifully situated recreation ground, lying immediately back of the city and over-looking the broad Pacific where its waters enter the Golden Gate. It contains nearly 1200 acres, and has many handsome drives and bridle-paths. Probably one-fourth of the Park is under cultivation, being tastefully laid out in ornamental gardens. There are playgrounds, streams, miniature lakes and waterfalls, music-stands, conservatory, deer park, and a buffalo range, an aviary, and numerous other attractions, the aviary being one of the finest in the country. It is this beautiful retreat that the graceful Fair buildings, shown in our illustration, have been erected, the whole covering less than 160 acres or a little more than one-eighth of the entire area of the Park. Among the buildings already erected or in course of construction are exposition halls for Manufactures and Liberal Arts, Mechanics, Agriculture and Horticulture, Fine Arts, Administration, Electric Stage, Hunting Hall, Mining Camp and Hall, besides a variety of kiosks, an arena for wild animals, a Hawaiian village, Scenic Railway, Sioux, Esquimaux, Tamil, Japanese, Egyptian, Italian and other villages. One of the most interesting and characteristic features will be a gold mine in actual operation, illustrating all the various processes. A Southern California farm, with the intricacies of irrigation will also be reproduced and every prominent phase of California animal and vegetable life, including the wild animals and reptiles of the desert, will be portrayed. To the student of nature, it will afford a wider field for investigation than even the Chicago Exposition. While the Midwinter Fair does not claim in any degree to be the rival of Chicago, still it will be a very extensive and altogether a memorable exposition.

California is preparing to welcome her guests in hospitable fashion, and an effort will be made on all sides to make the Midwinter Exposition, whether successful in a financial sense or not, a credit to the industry, intelligence, patriotism, and progress of the Golden State. A pleasant feature in the programme is a proposed daily prayer service on the grounds, after the manner of the services held during the Chicago Fair. This recognition of the Divine Father and Ruler in guiding the affairs of men and States, will be regarded with genuine satisfaction by Christians everywhere.

Be True to Yourself.

I wish I could spend a fortnight in a world where folks dared to be true to themselves, writes Martha Everts Holden, where the conformist was shelved with last year's calendars, and a man studied out his own route to heaven and had the courage to walk in it. I would like to dwell with individuals and not with packs of human cards shuffled together in sets. Life is something better than a sheep-path aimlessly skirting the hills. It is a growth upward through the infinite blue into heaven. It is the spreading of many and various branches. If you are a willow, don't attempt to be a pine, and if the Lord make you to grow like an elm don't pattern yourself after a scrub oak. The rebuke "what will people say?" should never be applied to the waywardness of a child. Teach it rather to ask: "How will my own self-respect stand this test?" Such training will evolve more development than a candle-mold or a yard-stick.

The Voice of the Soul.

In a recent article in Current Topics, Prof. Drummond furnishes this beautiful illustration: "God's voice is continually speaking to all of us, but we do not know it. We think something else is God. We look up there for God as if there were any 'up there.' The wise man knows that there is no such place as 'up there,' because what is 'up there' to-day will be down there to-night. God is a spirit. The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth. You have heard of Helen Kellar, the deaf and dumb girl. Until she was seven years of age, her mind was an absolute blank, but strange avenues by the skill of those celebrated Boston teachers of the deaf and dumb, were opened into this dark soul and through those avenues a great deal of knowledge of life and of the world were poured into the girl's mind. But nobody said anything to her about religion, and after a year or two, they thought it was time she was told something about God, and they took her to Phillips Brooks and they told him to put into her some elementary lessons about God. And he sat down beside the child and talked to her for a long time, and the child listened, and he told her about who God was and how he made the world and made her, and how his name was Love, and how he lived in people and spoke to them and urged them to do good,—that was God. The child looked up and said, 'Mr. Brooks, I knew all that before, but I did not know his name.' We have all felt these pressures, these motions, these voices of the soul. Perhaps we did not know that that was God.

We should recognize in these impulses and pressures the actual activities of God, for they are the direct influencing of our spirit by his Spirit, and all that is necessary for growth is to yield ourselves to these impulses."

HE CAME TO SAVE.

THERE'S a joy for every sorrow,
There a cure for every pain,
There's a sweet for every bitter,
And for every loss a gain.
There is light beyond the darkness,
There is hope beyond the grave,
If we only will remember
That Lord Jesus came to save.

'Tis the sun that throws the shadow,
'Tis the cloud that gives the rain:
But the sun and weeping rain-drops
Bring us fields of golden grain.
When we reach that distant river,
We shall safely cross the wave,
If we only will remember
That Lord Jesus came to save.

THE CLOSE OF LIFE.

THE sun is slowly setting
Behind the tower of stone;
The twilight shadows gather,
The day is almost done.

The glorious sky above us—
The beauty of the world—
Is all spread out before us,
Like banner wide unfurled.

And yet the shades are deepened,
The leaves all brown and sere,
Tell of the changing seasons—
The Winter that is here.

At last when steps are feeble,
And eyes are growing dim,
We have that precious promise
That we shall "live with Him." B.F

THE CHILDREN'S QUEST.

TWO little waifs stood near one of entrances to the World's Fair, (says a writer in the "Ram's Horn,") with startled eyes and mouths opened wide with wonder and watched the surging crowds. They were hand in hand, little, slim, dirty hands, and every feature bespoke want and misery. The bleak autumn winds swept down the street and seemed to chill the shivering children as they stood there all desolate, among that great, hurrying, happy throng. A big policeman noticed them and asked what they wanted there. The elder one raised his large pleading eyes to him and said:

"A boy told us this was the 'great White City' and we want to go in."

"You have no money to go in there, child," the policeman said, "what do you want in there?"

The little four-year-old girl nudged the boy and whispered: "You tell, Jimmie."

"No, you tell." Then as she twisted her slender fingers over and over each other nervously she looked down and said:

"Ma's dead and she must be in there. She said she was going to that Beautiful City, and that me and Jimmie must go there too, and we thought this must be the place, we have walked so far. O, please sir, won't you let us in?"

The kind policeman told them of that far-off city where their mother had gone and as he saw the look of hopeless despair spread over the little face, he turned to brush away a tear that had stolen down his bronzed cheek and softly said, "Yes, children, you may go in," and with bowed head turned and walked away. In his heart he felt that the pure, innocent faith of these children was something that might well teach us older children the lesson of patient faith. For many of us, the journey to the end of life is a long, wearisome and trying one; but we have our Father's Word and the promise of Jesus, that, by keeping close to the Saviour's side, our feet shall at last find the inviting gates of the Beautiful City that stand wide open for all who love him and labor faithfully for him.

A Queen's Family Album.

In connection with the recent announcement of the birth of Queen Victoria's seventeenth grandchild, it is said that purely family occurrences of this kind are kept written up from day to day in a vast album. This is systematically examined, in order that the interchange of affectionate messages, which is a tradition with the royal family, may not be overlooked. In her own childhood the queen was very punctilious in recognizing the birthday anniversary and other such festival days in the life of her uncle George IV., and she still possesses under lock and key at Windsor the last birthday present she made to him.

MRS. PAULL raised her eyes, blank and miserable, to his face.

"Must the children hear of this? He is their father, Roger. He loves them and they love him. Or, is it inevitable that the story should be made public?"

"We will do our best to hush it up. I have seen the men to whom he owes the money. There will be no prosecution."

She took him up on the instant.

"Because you have made good their loss!"

"Hush! That is neither here nor there. His name is the same as yours and your children's. My chief concern is your comfort and happiness. This man must be a stranger to you from this time forth."

"I am his wife, Roger!"

He started up, strode to the window and remained there, his head bent, his fingers knotted behind his back, seeming to stare into the little yard where Elspeth was stretching dish-towels upon the line. Her stuff skirt was folded back above her knees, he observed, and pinned so tightly he wondered that she could walk. There were eight towels, and three were patched: Elspeth had a blue cotton handkerchief tied about her head like a turban.

His sister joined him there, laying a timid hand upon his cheek, her voice breaking as he drew her head to his breast. He stroked back her hair as he would his own little daughter's were he compelled to deny her petition; his brow and lips were unbent.

"Roger, dear, don't be displeased with me! I think my heart is breaking with the sorrow and the shame of it all. And what he says is bitter! bitter! But he is my husband, and, as he reminds me, my children's father. I vowed to forsake all others and hold to him,—to love, honor and obey. Nothing can release me from that obligation."

"Except—except—" the blood flooding his forehead darkly—"Alice!—sweet sister! believe me that I would not tell you if I could help it—I made it my business before coming here to see his employers,and others who were yet better conversant with his life of late. I have long suspected that he had other claims upon his means than you know of. He has not gone abroad alone. I saw the entry in his own handwriting in the office where he bought his tickets. He registered 'Paul Morgan and wife, Cincinnati.'"

She dropped back as if struck by a bullet. He brother caught her and carried her to a sofa. She had not swooned. Insensibility is a boon seldom granted to women of her mould. There was a minute of voiceless gasping; her hands, groping convulsively as in the dark, found and fastened upon one of her brother's. She raised it to her lips and pressed it there before she said, hollowly:

"If you can come over to-morrow to see me—we will talk of what it will be best to do. Or—shall I go to you?"

This he would not allow. He would call soon after breakfast. His time—his means—all that he had or could do—were at her service.

Then he asked—for he knew her as few [illegible]

"You would like to be alone, now?"

"Don't think me ungrateful—but it would be better—perhaps. Thank you for understanding me."

She had spoken truly in telling Elspeth, three hours after this interview, that her "head ached."

CHAPTER III.

[illegible]

With meekness, like thy saintly ones, to bow,

That man does not live—he has never [illegible] mystery of a woman's "constitutional headache." The foe who never omits an opportunity to spring upon his prey and has all seasons for his very own. Sometimes he is provoked to attack by a fast; sometimes by a feast; often by insomnia, and occasionally by too-sound slumber. Now, he creeps by almost imperceptible inches to the acme of torture; again, leaps, fell and furious from his lair as the sleeper awakes at morning to the horrors of demoniacal possession. With one victim the agonies of nansea augment the pains in the head; with another, one lobe of the brain throbs with mad anguish, and the other is dull and heavy as lead. A third cannot lift her head from the pillow without the agonized conviction that a ball of hot metal, pulsing as in a boiling kettle, rolls from one side of her cranium to the other.

There is the headache that assails the base of the brain and the adjacent cords of the neck, and still another form which lodges in the temples, and one variety, the seat of which is the frontal bone and the eye-balls, making light intolerable and sight a torment. No more excruciating form is, or can be experienced than that induced by mental pain—a sudden shock to nerve-centres and sensibilities. Then the frightened blood retreats to the citadel-brain, and will not be lured or compelled back to the clammy extremities; shivers run over the surface of the body, and the congesting pores alternately contract and gape, reducing the skin, now to freezing coldness, anon, to the dry heat of fever. Delirium is a not infrequent accompaniment of the last-named phase of this plague of feminine flesh; an insane disposition to talk! talk! talk! until exhaustion, or stupor intervenes, or the wild longing to escape from the place of torture, to find surcease from suffering in the wilderness, in the woods, in the sea—anywhere,—be it in the grave itself, so long as unconsciousness follows flight.

Once in a while, one reads in the daily prints of an unfortunate—sometimes the loving and beloved mother of a respectable family—who leaps from an upper window while suffering from nervous headache, or, wandering away from her bed in the dead of night, is found after days of anxious search, in the river or at the bottom of the well. Or, a healthy, happy woman complains of intense pains in the head, and after some hours of agony,dies in convulsions.

Ah, dear friends! much of tragedy lurks in the jests passed upon the all-convenient headache of the novel heroine and the every-day woman of real life.

"Synonymous with heartache?" Aye! and oftentimes the synonym of the death-throe of heart and brain.

Elspeth was used to her mistress' headaches, and played the skilled nurse when the "constitutional" malady routed the gallant will and laid the wrecked woman low. She was used, too, to seeing her set off upon the long, lonely tramps, as often as not in the evening after the children were safely folded,—walks from which the sufferer would return languid and tremulous, but able at last to sleep off the duller ache that had superseded keener pangs. She surmised—this shrewd and reserved servitor—that a business talk had brought on the attack. Had she had an inkling of the real condition of the thoroughbred who quitted her kitchen with a level chin and firm tread, she would have barricaded the front door, as a countrywoman of hers had done hundreds of years before, with her living bone and flesh.

The humid chill of the outer air was grateful to the pedestrian's hot forehead. She halted at the foot of her porch steps to draw in great breaths of it. The gloom of the ill-lighted streets where gas fought feebly with the falling fog,was welcome to eyes strained with staring into a future peopled with dreads.

She had loved her husband through indifference and open neglect and active unkindness; had served him as a dog his master, after she knew there was nothing to be gained by fidelity of service. Years ago—after long striving, at first sanguine,—finally desperate—she had resigned all hope of winning him to a higher manhood; had tried to accept him as he was and must ever remain, and to make the very best of the poor remnant of her happy dream of their united lives. Only he, whom she besought without ceasing, to give her grace, wisdom and patience, knew with what ingenuity she had endeavored to cloak Ernest's faults, and to make home attractive to the unsuccessful man sour with discontent, and at war with fortune.

The billiard-table was put into their New York house against her wishes. But when it was a fixture and her husband's solace in moodiness and petulance, she became his pupil, and learned to play a better game than most of the boon companions he liked—and she dreaded—to see about him. She made it convenient to be much in the room when billiards were played, and in her presence there was none of the betting she was confident ran high at other times. She detested all games of cards, as her father had before her, but Ernest encountered nowhere else so clever an opponent at backgammon and chess. Music was his most innocent recreation, and she devoted to her piano-practice whole hours of the day which she knew she must make up by toiling late into the night over her needle. His fastidious ear must not be offended by slovenly execution or false notes when he took it into his head to ask for a musical evening.

Love in such natures as this woman's is of a hardier growth than respect. Her stubborn fealty to her husband never allowed her to confess in her inmost thoughts that she despised him. She was too honest to pretend, in thought, or in prayer that she had honored him for the last ten years.

She could have told the day and hour when respect died an unnatural death. Ernest Paull was the treasurer of a charitable society connected with the church to which he and his wife belonged, and he had appropriated to purposes of his own funds held by him in trust for the organization. He had used the money for necessary expenses, he stated briefly to his wife. A woman of her breeding and tastes entailed upon her husband the obligation to live beyond his income. He dragged a lengthening chain of debt, and expected to do this while he lived—but this five or six hundred dollars—maybe it had mounted up to a thousand by this time—must be made up in some way, and speedily, or he was ruined. To be sure, there was the river, or a pistol-shot, or prussic acid, as an alternative, but there might be a disagreeable degree of publicity connected with that expedient. All this he uttered airily between the puffs of his cigar, eyeing her quizzically—as if curious as to the effect of the communication upon her mind.

With strange composure that ought to have warned him of volcanic changes going on beneath the placid surface, she insisted upon knowing the exact amount of the defalcation.

"An ugly word to ears polite, my love!" interrupted her husband.

"The thing is uglier. Tell me the whole truth, Ernest. Of course, I must get the money if you cannot."

"From your father, I suppose?" looking up from the row of figures he was at work upon.

"To whom else can I apply? I shall not tell him why I want it."

"Naturally not!" with a faint sneer. "While you are tapping the parental pocket you may as well ask for two thousand as one. There are other liabilities."

"Will three thousand cover everything?"

He assured her eagerly and seriously that it would—and more. In fact it would set him straight with the world. When she went to her father with her request, she stipulated that the money should be a loan to her personally, to be deducted from whatever portion he might have intended to leave her, should she survive him. In endorsing the cheque that put the whole amount into Ernest's hands, she frankly told him of the condition named by herself. A glare she had never seen there before flamed up in his handsome eyes.

"The woman who could do such a thing as that when her husband is the dupe of her sharp practice, is false to her marriage vows—and capable of any depth of degradation," he said with incisive coolness. "After this, nothing you do can surprise me."

But he took the money.

The straight sheet of November fog was, to her heated fancy, the canvas upon which memory projected this and a succession of scenes, similar, and yet more revolting. This man, calling himself a gentleman, and controlled in bodily exercise by the traditions of his class, had never lifted his hand against his wife, or failed in external demonstration of the deference due from his sex to hers. He would not, for example, have lowered himself in his own eyes by passing out of a door in advance of her, or by sitting while she stood; he would not have helped himself to an easy-chair when there was none for her, or kissed her with his hat on, or failed to raise it if he met or parted with her on the street. His manner to his wife was cited as an example for other and less attentive husbands by their enviously admiring spouses. In society he was "simply and altogether charming." Society, reasoning after the superficial style peculiar to itself, inferred that he must be yet more charming in the bosom of his family.

An exclamation of intensest self-disgust passed her lips. A boy, loitering homeward with a parcel that looked like a loaf of bread under his arm, turned to look at her:

"Eh! what say?"

Getting no reply, he stared hard at her and strolled on, rattling a stick against the palings and whistling a familiar hymn-tune. Brought back by the interruption to her actual environment, Alice Paull became aware that many voices near by were singing the same air:

Even Me! Even Me!
Let some droppings fall on Me!

She had never, to her present recollection noticed until now the plain church wedged in between its neighbors on the right hand and on the left, and standing further back from the street than either of them, as if trying to make more room for itself. The singing was in a building at the rear. She turned in at the gate and walked down the narrow brick walk,—an insatiate soul-thirst gaining upon her.

The familiar melody was the murmur and cool-sounding ripple of a forest-rill to the traveler upon the scorching highway. A wizened little sexton, with thin white hair, pushed open the inner door for her silently, and motioned her an empty seat. The singing ceased as she sank wearily upon the settee—which was the last in the house and leaned her head against the wall behind her. Every limb ached, and every nerve was a tense chord upon which pain smote fitfully—always with force.

This was the house of God—the courts in which David,in his hour of fever and thirst, longed to be a doorkeeper.

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee; send thee help out of Zion and strengthen thee out of the sanctuary!"

The words must mean something,or they would not be in the Bible. If she were not in perishing need of help and strength,where in all the universe of the all-pitiful Father was there a wretch who was in extremity great enough to entitle her to claim the promised succor?

Pass me not, O gracious Father?
Sinful though my heart may be.

Was that the way the hymn ran? Was there no balm for sorrow as for sin? These looked like good and sincere people—above suspicion as to respectability. She was in the right place on that back seat.

"And then begin with shame to take the lowest place."

Grant one poor sinner more a place,
Among thy saints O, God of grace!

Not even that belonged to her of right. She had never rented a pew in Brooklyn. Severe economies,bound upon her by circumstances unsuspected by the world outside of her home, had debarred her from that privilege. She had told Ernest one Sunday on her return from church, that she felt like a religious poacher. He was in a merry,kindly mood that day, or she would not have broached a subject fraught with humiliation of spirit to herself. She came of church-going people, who held as part of religion the obligation to support the public ordinances of the church. When she married Ernest Paull he was superintendent of a Sunday School and a deacon. He resigned both of these offices when he "went on the road." In four years he had not darkened the door of a church, and family-worship was omitted when he was at home. In his absence, she gathered the little ones about her morning and night for Bible-reading and prayers.

THE BOOK SHELF

THE DOLL IN LITERATURE.*

IT was not until literature, in the form of story, romance, tragedy and adventure had quickened her imagination, that the figure of the doll loomed up in the character of an absorbing interest, but once having appeared it never retired from the scene until advancing years forced the curtain to fall upon the exciting scenes of which it was always the heroine.

That was the truth of the matter—it was not a doll, but a heroine.

And some imagination was required to make it one. The doll of that day was not the dimpled, star-eyed creature of to-day, who can stand on her own firm little feet, whose plump legs and arms can be placed in any position, whose attitudes may be made to express emotions in accordance with the Delsarte system, and who has parted lips and pearly teeth, and indulges in features. Not at all.

The natural advantages of a doll of that period confined themselves to size, hair, which was sewn on a little black skull-cap—if it was not plastered on with mucilage—and eyes which could be jerked open if one pulled a wire which stuck out of her side. The most expensive and magnificent doll you could have was merely a big wax one, whose hair could be combed and whose eyes would open and shut. Otherwise they were all the same. Only the face and neck were of wax, and features were not studied by the manufacturers. All the faces were exactly the same shape, or rather the same shapelessness. Expression and outline would have been considered wanton waste of material. To-day, dolls have cheeks and noses, and lips and brows, they look smiling or pensive, childlike or sophisticated. At that time no doll was guilty of looking at all. In the middle of her smooth, round face was a blunt excrescence which was called a nose, beneath it was a line of red paint which was meant for a mouth, on each side of it was a tight-looking black or blue glass eye as totally devoid of expression and as far removed from any resemblance to a real eye as the combined talents of ages of doll manufacturers could make it.

How an imagination, of the most fervid sort, could transform this thing into a creature resembling human, one cannot explain. But nature is very good—sometimes—to little children. One day, in a squalid London street, I drove by a dirty mite sitting upon a step, cuddling warmly a little bundle of hay tied round the middle with a string. It was her baby. It probably was lily fair and had eyes as blue as heaven, and cooed and kissed her again—but grown-up people could not see.

WASHINGTON AND THE ARMY.†

While at Valley Forge, there occurred that episode in American history known as "Conway's Cabal," a conspiracy to ruin the reputation of Washington and to make Gates the commander-in-chief of the armies. The conspirators labored in secret by means of forged and anonymous letters and slanderous reports, to weaken the public confidence in Washington as a leader. Failing to effect their object by these means, (for he was every day rising higher in public esteem), it was determined to abridge his influence and extend that of Gates, by creating a new board of war, with the latter as president. This was affected late in November, 1877. The board was invested with large powers and, by delegated authority, assumed the control of the military affairs, which properly belonged to the province of the commander-in-chief. Congress intended to make Gates the master-spirit of the war; for, by a resolution, that body instructed their general of his appointment to an office, "upon the right execution of which the success of the American cause does eminently depend," and that it was the "intention of Congress to continue his rank as major-general in the army, and that he officiate at the board, or in the field, as occasion may require." His partisans in Congress hastened to assure him that he would soon be virtually commander-in-chief.

About the middle of October, Washington wrote a letter to Richard Henry Lee, in which he spoke plainly concerning Brigadier-General Conway, a French officer of Irish lineage, who, it was rumored, was about to be appointed by the Congress a major-general in the continental army. In his letter, the general stated: "It will be as unfortunate a measure as ever was adopted. I may add, and I think with truth, that it will give a fatal blow to the existence of the army. Upon so interesting a subject I must speak plainly. The duty I owe my country, the ardent desire I have to promote its true interests, and justice to individuals require this of me. General Conway's merit, then, as an officer and his importance in the army, exist more in his own imagination than in reality; for it is a maxim with him to leave no service untold, nor to want anything which is to be obtained by importunity. His promotion to major-general could not but prove disastrous, from the fact that he is the youngest brigadier in the army, and his exaltation over all the eldest would create dangerous dissatisfaction. In a word, the service is so difficult, and every necessary so expensive, that almost all of our officers are tired out. Do not, therefore, afford them good pretexts for retiring. No day passes over my head without applications for leave to resign. Within the last six days, I am certain twenty commissions at least have been tendered to me. I have undergone more than most men are aware of, to harmonize so many discordant parts; but it will be impossible for me to be of any further service if such insuperable difficulties are thrown in my way."

SPEECH AND INTELLECT.*

The whole development and perfecting of the child's will is manifested most plainly in the learning of speech. Here the error of the old theory, that the intellect has its origin in language is demonstrated beyond denial. Just the reverse of that is true. Only he who has already much intellect, more than any brute has, can learn to speak; for articulate speech requires two things: above all, hearing and understanding of what is spoken (or, in the case of one born deaf, the preceiving of what is spoken through the sense of sight or of touch); next, the expression of one's own ideas by means of quite definite co-ordinated muscular movements, together with the employment of breathing, and in the great majority of nations, of exhalation exclusively.

Taken altogether, it has been found that speech is a higher development of pantomime. By means of a great number of gestures and an extremely subtly developed play of feature, uninstructed deaf mutes understand each other at this day, just as in primeval times without doubt, did primeval men who were ignorant of speech. And what we know in general of the most ancient languages shows so great an agreement in regard to the most important characteristics of the language of the children at the present time, that we may say the human race as a whole has behind it a course of development in this matter similar to that which every normal child goes through in learning to speak. Nor can it be doubted that the formation of complex ideas, of higher concepts, therefore, which is favored in such an extraordinary degree by the acquirement of speech, in the case of the child, was advanced and completed in like manner in the case of the primitive man, and continues to be thus advanced and completed in the savage of the present day. It is not the knowledge of words that begets intellect and facilitates thinking; it is abundance of ideas, and hence of thoughts which grow out of the combination and separation of the ideas generated by sensations and preceptions. These ideas, however, must first be sharply separated from one another before they become available for abstractions of a higher sort and for new combinations; and the complete, sharp separation is made possible only by means of exact designation, and thus by knowledge of words, consequently by language.

Japan's First Convert.

Murata Wakasanokami's Brave Declaration for Christ, in the face of Fierce Persecution.

NOW that the religion of Jesus has obtained a secure foothold, and has many thousands of faithful adherents in Japan, the older among the converts look back, with a thrill of recollection, to the early days when the adoption of the Christian faith was attended with the greatest personal danger. Enshrined in the memories of the Christians of Japan is the name of Murata Wakasanokami, the first convert to Christianity in the empire of the Mikado. Murata was born in 1815. Destined to be "a foundation stone" for the edifice of Protestantism in Japan, he came into the world under the shadow of the awful persecution of the Christians in the seventeenth century. Nearly two hundred years had elapsed since the edicts prohibiting the "evil sect" were first promulgated and published prominently all over the empire and since the new order that as long as the sun should shine no foreigners should enter Japan or natives leave it; and these dangerous prohibitions were still in force when Murata was born.

He was a son or Nabeshima Magorokuro, a relative of the Daimyo, or Prince, of Saga-Hizen, Kiushiu. When he was a boy, he became the heir of the Murata family; and when a man, was appointed a minister of the Daimyo and a soldier. When English and French men-of-war anchored at Nagasaki in 1855, the Shogun commanded the two Daimyos of Saga and Fukuoko to guard the port. Wakasa was the commander of the Saga men. One day, when he was patrolling the port, he found a strange book in the water and told one of his men to pick it up.

Neither he nor they whom he met and questioned knew what book it was or what its contents were. So after he returned home, his growing curiosity prompted him to seek an explanation; and to accomplish his burning desire to know what the book was, he sent one of his men, Eguchi Baitei, to Nagasaki, ostensibly to study medicine, but, in fact, the new book. Baitei entered more or less into the spirit of his master's curiosity. He soon learned from the Dutch that the book was the Holy Bible. He caught its general idea, and reported all he had heard and learned to his master. Afterward Wakasa heard that a Chinese version was published at Shanghai. He secretly sent a man there and bought a copy. Henceforth, he, together with his brother and some friends, earnestly studied the Scriptures day and night. When [illegible] went to Nagasaki in 1862, to get aid in understanding the Bible, he unexpectedly met the Rev Dr. Verbeck, a missionary of the Reformed Church in America, and he asked him many questions. Dr. Verbeck kindly taught Wakasa and others through this channel. This Bible class lasted almost three years. These eager pupils came to understand Christianity more fully. They grew in faith and determined to be baptized. Wakasa had to state their [illegible] to the Daimyo, for it was a [illegible] the edict against the "evil sect;" [illegible] that it might be better to do so after baptism. At last, Wakasa, Ayabe and Motono declared their determination to Dr. Verbeck, professed their faith in Christ, were baptized, and partook of the Lord's Supper. This took place on the 20th day of May, 1866. Wakasa was then fifty-one years old.

When these fervent Christians on their return reported to the Daimyo what they had done, he, seeing the firmness of their faith, left them unquestioned. The Imperial Government on hearing of Wakasa's conversion commanded the Prince to punish him, and he burned some of Wakasa's books.

Wakasa-no-Kami's last years were spent calmly, he having retired to a villa in Kubota, in rural quietude. It is said that in those days he was engaged in translating the Bible from Chinese into Japanese. He was 60 years old when he died. Two years before his death the first Protestant Church was organized at Yokohama. His memory is deeply cherished by Christians still living, who, in earlier days, felt the power of his earnest personality. An authentic portrait of this eminent Christian is published on this page.

I HEARD THE ANGELS SING.

ALONE at night I seemed to hear
The song of angels sounding near;
The starry night was fair and clear,
It seemed to bring the heavens anear,
Oh joy? I heard the angels sing!

I seemed to see each starry crown;
I seemed to see them stand around,
The great White Throne on high,
And then, oh joy! I heard them sing,
I heard them shout before their King,
Hosannas, loud and long.
And when they sang of God their King,
They seemed to make the welkin ring,
So loud and clear the song.

Anon, they sang so soft and low,
Of him who loved us mortals so—
Oh joy, they sang of heaven!
The heaven I hope some day to see;
Oh joy, they sang of heaven for me,
To whom was pardon given.

And then their snow-white wings they spread,
And far above me, overhead,
They circled round and round;
Now faint and sweeter grew their notes,
As though they came from skylarks' throats,
Far from from the solid ground.

And now, whene'er an angel sings,
I care not for these earthly things
That oft my heart have riven;
O'erburdened with this worldly care,
My soul looks up, with yearnings rare
To catch some strain of heaven;
For I, oh joy! have heard them sing
I saw the angels on the wing;
I heard them sing of heaven.

The Priest-Kings of Egypt.

More Archaeological Discoveries Which Confirm the Bible History.

SCIENCE is constantly administering rebukes to scepticism and infidelity. Almost every great archaeological find in the present century has been more or less confirmatory of sacred history. The telegraphic news of discoveries of monuments and tombs of priests in Egypt, writes George Ebers, the greatest student of Egyptology, is now fully verified. Remarkably enough, the newly found relics of antiquity were discovered near the mummy repository of Der el-Bahri (Thebes) from which the bodies of the kings, the most valuable specimens in the Boulak Museum, were brought to light in 1881. Among these mummies, thousands of years old, were the remains of the most famous Pharaohs of the new empire, and beside them, all that was left of the rich king named Rhampsinitos. The monuments have rendered us fairly well acquainted with his personality and have taught us that he once enriched Egypt's priesthood with unprecedented generosity. When we also learn that Ramses III. gave to the priest and temples 113,433 slaves, 514 vineyards and gardens, 514,668 head of cattle, 6,000,000 bushels of grain and precious metals of many millions value, as well as that the predecessors of this ruler placed at the disposal of the priests of Amon, the highest god of Thebes, the lion's share of plunder of war, besides large quantities of other wealth, we must consider it only natural that the property and the power of the hierarchy eventually surpassed the property and power of the worldly sovereign.

The priests of Amon, did, in fact, succeed in usurping the sovereignty after the spendthrift Ramses III. had been followed on the throne by a line of incapable descendants, and in the tomb of Der el-bahri were found remains of the priest kings who constituted part of the twenty-first dynasty. Monuments reveal also that the priests of Amon, before they usurped the sceptre, had gained immense influence in military and civil life at large. The monuments even tell us how and in what length of time the prelates swung themselves upward from one dignity to the next, till they eventually grasped the honors of the head priest of the god Amon. There were, moreover, priestesses of Amon, and in the days of the new empire which we are considering, very many of them. The head priests of Amon were buried with great pomp, but that their collected bodies should be found in one tomb, was a great surprise, especially in view of former discoveries of many individual tombs.

The cavity in which the royal mummies were found is in the projection of the bare limestone mountain that separates Der el-Bahri from the valley of the tombs of the kings. The entrance is high above the level ground and the interior is rough. Inscriptions on the coffin of Seti I. and on mummy wrappings teach that the bodies of famous old Pharoahs among the priest kings of the twenty-first dynasty were collected from their individual resting-places and laid to rest in this cavity in the mountain. This was done to protect the mummies from the disturbing hand of the robber. Although the floor of the vaults had been untrodden for three thousand years, there were found injured sarcophagi and the battered remains of gilded faces.

One hundred and eighty mummies in handsome threefold coffins with the remains of the priest kings of the twenty-first dynasty and the priests of Amon, have been brought to light. Fifty Osiris statuettes have been found and ten of them are known to contain papyri. Students of Scripture will be eager to learn what the upper stories of this wonderful cavern contain and what papyrus rolls are lodged around the mummies of the priests of Amon. Who knows what surprises the inexhaustible ruins of Egypt have in store for us in the vicinity of Der el-Bahri?

"THE COMFORTER ABIDES."

DEARER this promise we have heard
Than any one besides
Which comes to us from God's own Word—
"The Comforter abides."

And evil e'er betides,
We have a refuge for the soul—
"The Comforter abides."

And in his love confides,
Will find he is a friend indeed—
"The Comforter abides."

BRAZIL'S IMPERIAL PRETENDER.

AFFAIRS in the Brazilian Republic are still in a very disturbed condition and there is no immediate prospect of a termination of the fractricidal war that has now harassed the country for many months. Admiral Mello, the insurgent leader, lately withdrew from the harbor of Rio Janeiro to take active command of the rebel forces in the South, and Admiral de Gama took his place as director of operations before Rio. It is still undecided whether the chances of ultimate triumph rest with Peixoto's forces or the insurgents. There is a well-defined feeling that the insurrectionary movement is really a bold stroke for the restoration of the Empire, and this feeling has been strengthened by the admission of Admiral Gama of his imperial preferences. Should the insurrectionists succeed in ousting the Peixoto government, their candidate would, it is believed, be none other than Dom Pedro d' Alcantara Louis Philippe, the eldest son of the Count d' Eu. Comtesse d' Eu, who claims to be the legal heir of the Brazilian throne, is decidedly unpopular and would readily waive her own claims in favor of her son. It was said that as soon as the prospects of the revolution were sufficiently bright to warrant such a step, the young Count would secretly leave Europe for Rio, and hold himself in readiness for an emergency that might call him, on the briefest notice, to assume supreme command of affairs. The Prince, who is now eighteen years old, has been educated in Portugal, France and Austria. In 1889, he accompanied his grandfather, Dom Pedro, into exile. His portrait is given on this page.

A BRAVE CAPTAIN'S SACRIFICE.

DURING the recent Atlantic gales, many vessels were wrecked off the European coasts, among them being the steamer Cyprian, commanded by Captain Strachan and bound from Liverpool for Mediterranean ports. She struck a rock near Nevin on the Welsh coast. One after another, those who had life-belts dropped over the vessel's side into the water. Two firemen alone stood paralyzed; they looked hopelessly at the sea, and going down below were never seen again. Meanwhile the captain, who was himself prepared with a life-belt, caught sight of a poor little pale-faced stowaway, who had hidden himself in the vessel before starting from England. Without hesitation Captain Strachan unbuckled the life-belt from his waist and lashed it ship-shape upon the little stowaway, bidding him save himself if it were the mercy of Providence that this should be so. "I can swim," said the captain; "take the belt." Over the side went the stowaway, lifted upon the surf like a cork; over the side went the captain, trusting, like a good, brave fellow that he was, to his strength, but enfeebled with long watching and anxiety. But swimming was impossible in snch a sea. The boatswain, struggling for his own life, caught at the captain, and both were drowned, while the little stowaway, with the captain's belt about his waist, was flung upon the Welsh coast, battered about but alive, to tell the story of his kind friend's heroism. Yet what was the self-forgetting heroism of Captain Strachan, noble as it was, compared with that of Christ, who gave his life for our deliverance. The universal feeling of admiration for such bravery as Captain Strachan's shows how marvellous is the ingratitude of thousands who refuse to recognize and render thanks to God for the infinitely vaster sacrifice of Christ who "Died the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God."

THE HAND OF GOD.

IN all the stars that radiant burn,
And shine athwart the gloom of night,
Obedient to the voice that spake,
And out of darkness called the light,
Is seen the hand of God.

Whichever way I turn my eyes,
Searching to find out wisdom's ways,
In heaven alone or earth beneath,
The soul adores in songs of praise,
And sees the hand of God.

On mountain-top, in valley deep,
Where swelling rivers rise and flow;
On lofty peak, whose towering height,
Concealed beneath eternal snow,
Appears the hand of God.

Amid earth's tumults, noise and strife,
Its conflicts fierce and shadows dim,
Where good and evil intermix,
All, all proclaim the power of Him—
The one Almighty God.

FROM DARKNESS TO LIGHT.

Up to thirty years ago, there was but a handful of evangelical Christians in Russia. Slowly, and then more rapidly, the Stundist congregations have grown until now two hundred and fifty thousand of these evangelical Christians are scattered over southern and southwestern Russia. The history of the Russian Molochans, who are found in the east and southeast of the country, is much like that of the Stundists, save that it dates back a century and a half. Some estimate the number of Russian evangelical Christians by the millions. Probably there are at least 500,000, though many times that number are in sympathy with them. Nothing has done so much toward the spread of this movement as the wide sale of the Bible. Less than a century ago the Bible was exceedingly scarce, but now every year the British and Foreign Bible Society alone sells half a million copies, and during the past eighty years has put in circulation nine million volumes. The Bible is transforming the Russians, and bringing them from darkness into light.

A DOLLAR SAVED, TWO EARNED.

These Statements which 80,000 Prudent People have Substantiated.

Now that all are looking for the best plan to make a dollar do the work of two, there is one great institution in the metropolis which meets the people half way. It has 80,000 members who are satisfied that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association furnishes life insurance at about one-half the rates charged by companies run under the old-fogy, "back-number" systems.

The Mutual Reserve's interest income annually exceeds $130,000. Its reserve fund November 13, 1893, was $3,554,326; it has paid death claims amounting to $17,341,503; new business in 1892 exceeded $60,000,000; for eleven months of this year has been over $53,243,000, and the insurance in force exceeds $250,000,000.

With this marvelous showing as a result of less than thirteen years' effort by President Edward B. Harper and his able official coadjutors, is it any wonder that new policies are largely increasing, more especially at this holiday season, when it is quite the proper thing to give a life insurance policy as a substantial token of affection and good will, especially when it can be had at such low figures as the Mutual Reserve offers.

And safe? The receipts on the last mortuary call were $533,598.98, and the cash and invested reserve surplus is nearly $3,555,000. The tables contained in the auditors' report, just issued, prove all these statements and show that this reserve is in gilt-edge securities.

It is a proud moment for the Mutual Reserve, when, about to move into its stately new home, it points to more than $35,000,000 saved to its members by reducing the premium rates charged to members to harmonize with the payments to the widows and orphans for death claims. No other institution can show so grand a record of success at such slight cost to members.

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practiced by George Thomas Congreve.

THIRD INTERVIEW,

By the Special Commissioner,

With REV. W. R. CAPEL, Bournemouth, late Vicar of Bickenhill, near Birmingham.

It was a real pleasure to me to meet the gentleman above named. It was a day in early November when I called at his residence, Cairnryan, Poole-road, Bournemouth—an ideal day for the time of year—and I, who had just come away from London fogs, duly appreciated the great and welcome change.

I found Mr. Capel most genial, and ready to afford me every information, and willing to tell me all about his complaint and how he was cured.

In answer to your initial question Mr. Capel said:

"Even as a young man I was always delicate, and was sent to Madeira. I was told that I should never reach eighteen, then that I could not live till twenty; but here I am at sixty-three, and I expect to be able to last a little longer."

If appearances go for anything, Mr. Capel is very likely to prove correct.

"What was it you suffered from, Mr. Capel?" I asked.

"From bronchitis and asthma, inherited from my mother. She died of asthma. At the time my wife first applied to Mr. Congreve, in 1887, I suffered a great deal, the attacks being both frequent and severe. I have already described the symptomes—the night cough, thick expectoration, soreness of the chest, and difficulty of breathing. The first winter after commencing the treatment recommended by Dr. Congreve I was much better—in fact, I was entirely free from any attack of asthmatic-bronchitis. I certainly caught a cold once, but with the aid of the medicine I was soon all right again."

"And I suppose I may take it, Mr. Capel, that you are still keeping well?"

"I have just had another attack of bronchitis, caused by catching a frightful cold through going out in very bad weather. When I came home I knew I was in for it, so I just took some of the medicine, and that put me right."

"You are certainly very enthusiastic about Mr. Congreve's Balsam," I remarked.

"It is the best medicine I have ever had. I have recommended it over and over again. I have proved it to be a splendid remedy. I don't think that I ever mentioned before that once when I was staying in Brighton I missed the assistant at a shop at which I dealt. On asking for him I was told that he was done for—there was no hope of his recovery. Some time after, on passing down Western-road, I found this very man about to start in business. I went into the shop and spoke to him, and he told me that he had been restored by Mr. Congreve's medicine."

"I believe you have been applied to with reference to another case?"

"A clergymen wrote and asked me if the testimonial I had given was genuine, as he was anxious to persuade a young farmer in his parish to try it. I assured him it was the best thing he could do, and was much gratified to hear from the same clergyman, some months later, that the young man, who was the only son and support of his widowed mother, had quite recovered; in fact, the week before my correspondent wrote me, the patient had walked eighteen miles, and was none the worse for it."

"I am sure I am much obliged to you for so kindly speaking in favor of the treatment."

"I am only too glad to do anything to make it known. I consider myself much indebted to Mr. Congreve."

Before I said "Good-morning," the Rev. W. R. Capel told me that a doctor, a near neighbor of his, was recommending Mr. Congreve's treatment to a Major-general whom he knew, which latter fact, I consider, speaks volumes for the liberality and good sense of the medical gentleman referred to.

NOTE.—Mr. Capel's own case was published (in the weekly papers only) in June, 1890.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts. or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $1.75, $3.75 or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.
